Dependencies.

BY A LATE OFFICIAL RESIDENT.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY THE AUTHOR. 1842.

MY LORD,

Your Lordship having appointed me as a Special Magistrate for the Mauritius, I am indebted to that circumstance, for whatever knowledge or information I possess of the Colony; and to you, therefore, I respectfully beg leave to dedicate this account of the Island and its dependencies. It is a well known fact, that of all the British possessions, less is known of the Mauritius generally, than of any other of our Colonies; and when the vast National and Commercial consequence of the Island is considered, whether in reference to produce or her important position, in relation to our East India possessions and Trade, is a matter of surprize.

Should this brief account of the Island and its dependencies meet your Lordship's approval, and add towards the better knowledge of this interesting possession, my object will be attained.

> I have the honour to be, My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient,

And very humble servant,

THE AUTHOR.

To the Right Honourable the Lord Stanley, Secretary for the Colonial Department.

Report on visit to the Islands of the Chagos Group.

Bambous, Black River, 11th June 1883.

The Honorable
The Colonial Secretary.

Sir.

I have the honour to transmit to you herewith, for submission to His Excellency the Governor, my report on the result of my recent visit to the Islands of the "Chagos" Archipelago.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

IVANOFF DUPONT,

Acting Magistrate for the Lesser Dependencies.

580

Report of the Acting Magistrate for the Lesser Dependencies of Mauritius on the result of his recent visit to the Islands of the Chagos Group. viz:

Diego Garcia

Six Islands

Eagle Island

Peros Banhos

Salomon Islands.

1. I left Mauritius on the 18th April 1883 on board of the Steam Tug "Stella," and I arrived on the 27th at Diego Garcia, where we anchored at noon, at "Pointe de l'Est".

This Island, since my last visit in 1881, has become a coaling station for the Steamers of the Orient and Pacific Steam Navigation Companies, and others, and I have made a special report on the changes which have taken place by that fact.

2. Two sailing ships were then unloading coals:— the "Rothesay Bay" from Australia, for Lund & Co., and the "Religione e Liberta", from England, for the Orient Company.

The next morning at Roll Call I informed the labourers that I was ready to hear any complaint which they might have to make.

No complaints were made either by the Manager or by the labourers.

Seventeen of the Europeans and the Somaulis are in the employ of the Orient Company, the first as workmen making iron lighters, and the last as labourers engaged at Port Said before the French Consul for one year.

The European workmen are expected to leave in the beginning of next year, after the completion of the iron lighters, and the Somaulis will be sent back to Port Said as soon as labourers will have been obtained from Mauritius.

One European, Mr. George Worsell, is Agent at Diego Garcia for Lund & Co .

The number of persons employed with the proprietors of the Island amounts to : $\,$

5. The Europeans and Somaulis in the employ of the Orient Company provisionally reside at Pointe de PEst, no building having as yet been erected on the Islet, at the entrance of the Bay, which has been let by the Government to the Company.

- e. I inspected the labourers' camp which I did not find in very good state of repair nor of cleanliness, and I called the attention of the Manager to this fact. Most of the huts belong to the labourers who have built them themselves.
- 7. The hospital was found by me in good order, and the supply of medicines sufficient.

The prisons are the same which I have reported on in February 1881.

I found from the prison register that 39 cases of imprisonment of labourers had taken place during the past 27 months, all of which for insolence, insubordination and disturbance.

No complaints were made by the labourers as regards those imprisonments.

9. I examined the Pay Book and found it properly kept.

The sum of Rs 28,230.76c has been paid to the labourers from the 1st of January 1881 to the 30th April 1883, showing monthly payments of Rs 1,008.24c; and the sum deducted for sickness and absences amounted to Rs 4,016.35c, giving monthly deductions of Rs 143.44c.

The wages are paid monthly.

10. The shop showed a pretty good supply of goods. The sum of Rs 17,132, 58e was paid by the labourers for merchandize from the 1st January 1881 to the 31st of March 1883, showing monthly purchases for the sum of Rs 634.54c.

The sales are made for cash, and on an average of 25 of above Mauritius prices.

11. The stores contained only 28 bags of rice, sufficient for two weeks rations, and when the ship of the company left on the 27th January last, there were in store rations for four months only instead of for six months, as required by the regulations.

The ship "Eva Joshua" was expected daily after my departure : she had arrived at Peros Banhos on the 11th of May.

The rations issued to the labourers are more than those to which they are entitled.

The labourers rear fowls and ducks. They are not allowed to rear pigs for which they could not procure food on the island, and would therefore be induced to steal cocoa-nuts to feed them.

The boats and nets of the establishment continue to be placed at their disposal for fishing.

- 12. The task works are fair and reasonable, and the Sunday "Corvée" is according to the Regulations.
- 13. The Sanitary condition of the island is good. There exists no prevailing disease.

14. I examined the Registers of the Civil Status which show that from the first January 1881 to the 30th April 1883 the following number of Births and Deaths had take place.

The medicines in store were sufficient.

^{21.} The camp was inspected by me and found to be in good order.

^{22.} The hospitals were in good order and of the required dimensions.

23. The prison which existed at the time of my last visit has been pulled down by the Manager, and, pending the erection of a new one, a room in a stone building, of proper dimensions, is used as a prison.

The punishment of imprisonment was inflicted on 30 labourers during the past 27 months, as follows.—27 were imprisoned for insolence, msubordination and disturbance and 3 for larceny. As regards these last I informed the Manager that they were illegal, and I desired him to confine himself to the cases for which the regulations authorize him to imprison, as otherwise he would be liable to the penalties provided for by the same regulations, should complaints be made against him.

He gave as an excuse that he thought that he was authorized to imprison also for larcenies, which, he stated, were of frequent occurrence.

No complaints were made by the labourers.

 $24.\ I$ examined the Pay Book and found that Rs 23,558.52 c. had been paid to the labourers from the 1st January 1881 to the 30th April 1883, showing monthly payments of Rs 841.27 c. and that the sum of Rs 4,520.14 c. had been deducted for sickness and absences, giving monthly deductions of Rs 161.43 c.

The wages are paid monthly.

25. The amount of the sales in the shop has been from the 1st May 1881, the accounts from 1st January to 30th April 1881 not being in the possession of the actual Manager, Rs 11,226,81 c. showing monthly sales of Rs 468.78 c.

The sales are made for cash, and, on an average, at about 40 oto above the prices in Mauritius.

26. The stores contained only 24 bags of rice, sufficient for three weeks rations. The "Eva Joshua" was expected daily.

When the said ship left on the 27th January last there were in store 121 bags of rice, sufficient for four months rations only.

The labourers rear fowls and ducks, and easily procure fish by means of the boats and nets of the establishment.

- 27. The task works are fair and reasonable, and the Sunday Corvée is according to the regulations.

76. I inspected the camp which I found in good state of repair; the huts being according to the regulations.

77. The hospital was found by me to be in good order, and the supply of medicines sufficient.

78. The prison has been rebuilt since my last inspection. It consists of a stone building containing three rooms which measure only 7x6 feet. I desired the Manager to remove the partitions and to divide the building into two rooms only.

Eighteen cases of imprisonment have been registered since 1st of January 1881:—

- 10 for disturbance.
- 3 for insubordination.
- 2 for insolence.
- 3 for repeated absences from work.

I warned the Manager as to the illegality of these three last cases. He gave for excuse that the parties were constantly absent from their work and behaved disorderly in the camp.

79. From the Pay Book it appeared that the sum of Rs.24,782.27c. has been paid for wages to the labourers from the 1st January 1881 to the 30th April 1883, showing monthly payments of Rs.885.08c. The amount deducted for sickness and absences was Rs.1,946.81c.giving monthly deductions of Rs. 69.53c.

The wages were paid monthly.

80. The sales in the shop from the 1st January 1881 to the 30th April 1883 have produced the sum of Rs. 16,105.57c., giving monthly purchases of Rs. 575.20c.

The sales are made for cash, and at about 25 olo above Mauritius prices.

- 81. The number of bags of rice in store added to the quantity brought by the Ship "Eva Joshua" whilst I was at the Island exceeded the amount required by the regulations.
- 82. The task works are fair and reasonable, and the Sunday Corvée according to the regulations.
- 83. The Registers of the Civil Status showed that the following Acts have been registered since the 1st January 1881:

The cause of the death given as "unknown" was reported on by me in February 1881. The death was only registered after I had examined the Registers of the Civil Status.

I made into the cause of the death given as "poisoning" an enquiry which I have referred to the Honorable the Procureur General. The death was caused by an excessive dose of laudanum, taken by the deceased out of a small flask which had been imprudently left in his possession by the then assistant manager of the Island.

No still-births and no marriages have been registered by the Officer of the Civil Status.

84. The production of the Island has been

SALOMON ISLANDS

- 87. I arrived at "Salomon" Islands on the 12th May 1883, at 4 o'clock p. m.
- 88. The same afternoon, when all the labourers were assembled, I enquired from them if they had any complaint to make. They all said that they had none.

No complaint was brought by the Manager.

- 90. The camp on inspection was found to be in good state of repair.
- 91. The hospital was not in good order. The Manager, on my remark to him, said that it was never used. That he did not insist on the laborers coming to the hospital, for which they showed disinclination, and that he attended on them in their huts.

I desired him however to comply with the regulations.

92. The prison has been rebuilt, and is in compliance with the regulations. $\,-\,$

Two labourers were imprisoned since my last visit in July 1882: one for disturbance and one for insubordination.

- 93. The Pay Book, after examination, showed that Rs4799. 04c; have been paid to the laborers since 1st July 1882, showing monthly payments of Rs 479.90c, and that Rs 306.76c, had been deducted for sickness and absences, giving monthly deductions of Rs 30.67c.
- 94. Goods for the sum of Rs 3767.84c. have been sold in the shop from 1st July 1882 to the 30th April 1883, or an average monthly sum of Rs 376.78c.

The goods are sold for cash, and at about 35 op above Mauritius prices.

- 95. The stores contained a stock of rice sufficient for 5 months' rations, and a further supply was expected in the course of the month.
- 96. The task work is fair and reasonable, and the Sunday Corvée is according to the regulations.
- 97. The Registers of the Civil Status showed that no births, no still-births, and no marriages had been registered for the past 10 months.

One death had happened, that of a male labourer who died of consumption.

- 98. The production of the Island is estimated by the Manager at 17,000 veltes for the present year.
- 99. The communications of the Island with Mauritius take place three times during the year.
- 100. On the 18th May, at noon, I left Salomon Islands for Diego Garcia where I arrived the next day; and on the 19th May, at 8 o'clock a.m. I left Diego Garcia for Mauritius where the "Stella" anchored on the 25th May at 11.30 in the night.

All of which is respectfully submitted for the information of His Excellency the Governor.

AN ORDINANCE

Enacted by the Officer Administering the Government of Mauritius and its Dependencies, with the advice and consent of the Council of Government thereof.

To provide for the Government of and the Administration of Justice in the Lesser Dependencies.

I reserve this Ordinance for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereon.

18th April, 1904.

BE IT ENACTED by the Officer Alministering the Government, with the advice and consent of the Council of Government, as follows:—

Short Title 1. This Ordinance may be cited as "The Lesser Dependencies Ordinance".

Definitions.

2. In this Ordinance:

"Owner" includes lessee.

" Islands" means the Lesser Dependencies mentioned in Schedule A, or any one of them.

"The Magistrate", or "a Magistrate", means any one of the District and Stipendiary Magistrates for the Lesser Dependencies appointed under this Ordinance, and includes an Additional Magistrate appointed under Article 3 (3).

Appointment of 3. (1) Itshall be lawful for the Governor, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, to appoint two fit and proper persons to be District and Stipendiary Magistrates for the Lesser Dependencies, mentioned in Schedule A.

- (2) Each of the said Magistrates shall act independently of the other, and shall have the rights, duties, powers and jurisdiction defined by this Ordinance.
- (3) It shall further be lawful for the Governor when necessity arises to issue a commission to any other fit or proper person to act as Additional Magistrate for the Lesser Dependencies, and such Magistrate shall, in virtue of such commission and during its continuance, have all the powers of a Magistrate for the Lesser Dependencies.

Visits of Magis trate to Islands. Shall visit the Islands at such times as they shall be directed by the Procureur General, and shall administer justice therein between the Crown, private individuals, and masters and servants as defined by the Labour Law, 1878.

Provided that so far as may be possible each Island shall be visited at least once in every twelve months: and if any Island has not been visited for a period of twelve months it shall be visited on the first opportunity in the ensuing twelve months.

- (2) The Magistrates shall further have power to visit and inspect all the establishments on the Islands, and all camps and houses (other than private dwelling houses) thereon, to inspect the books of the establishment and of the shops, and to test the weights and measures used in such shops.
- (3) They shall respectively report to the Governor the result of each visit and of the inspections made, and generally on all matters connected with the well-being of the Islands and the welfare of the inhabitants. There shall also be included in such report a return of all decisions given, and action taken, in all matters brought before them or which have come under their notice.

Salary of Mogis. 5. The salary of trate.

each of the Magistrates shall be 6,000 Rupees which shall be paid by the Treasury. The said salary shall cover all expenses and allowances hitherto allowed, to which the Magistrates shall henceforth have no further claim.

Provided that any Magistrate appointed under Article 3 (3) shall be entitled to an allowance for expenses of 5 Rupees a day during his absence from Mauritius, which allowance shall be paid by the Treasury.

Contribution to cost of administration by owners.

6. (1) The owners of the Islands shall contribute to the cost of administration of the Islands the sum of 12,000 Rupees in two half-yearly instalments, payable in the manner hereinafter provided, on or before the 31st. January and 31st. July in every year.

- (2) The said contribution shall be apportioned between the owners of the Islands, according to the number of labourers employed by each of them, and the sum due by each owner shall be paid into the Treasury on or before the dates above-mentioned. For the purpose of such apportionment, each of the owners shall furnish the Receiver General with a statement of the said number of men so employed on the 30th. June and 31st, December in each year. The statement may be controlled by the Magistrate, and any owner making a false statement shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 1,000 Rupees.
- (3) For the recovery of the said amount due from each owner the Government shall have a privilege, and the extent and conditions of such privilege shall be governed by Ordinance No. 18 of 1843, and shall be assimilated to the land tax mentioned in Article 31 of that Ordinance.

(4). When it is necessary for the purpose of any criminal trial or other proceeding in Mauritius that any persons should come to Mauritius as witnesses, or be brought to Mauritius as prisoners, the passage of such persons shall be provided free of cost on the vessels belonging to or chartered or employed by the owner of the Island on which the acts occurred out of which such trial or proceeding arises, and in their ordinary voyages. The cost of feeding to be refunded to the owners.

Magistrate.

Who is about to visit one of the Islands shall be provided by the owners with free passage and maintenance to and from such Island on board any vessel belonging to, or chartered or employed by, the owner of such Island, and to maintenance while on such Island,

(2) Vessels going to and from the Islands shall carry mails free on behalf of the Post Office.

Jurisdiction of 8. (1) The Magistrate shall be vested with the power and authority of District and Stipendiary Magistrates respectively in Mauritius, subject only to the modifications hereinafter enacted.

- (2) A Court shall be held in such convenient room or place in the Island, and on such days and at such hours as the Magistrate shall determine.
- (3) The Magistrate shall have power, in any case or matter, to appoint and swear in such person as he deems fit to act as interpreter.
- Engagement of 9. (1) All servants, other than artisans, proceeding to the Islands for employment shall previously enter into a written contract of service passed as follows:—
 - (i) If in Mauritius, then before a Magistrate, or before the Stipendiary Magistrate of Port-Louis.
 - (ii) If in the Islands, then before a Magistrate.

Provided that in either case the Magistrate shall be satisfied that such servant is free to enter into such contract.

(iii) If in Seychelles, then before any officer of Seychelles authorised by the laws of Seychelles to pass such contracts.

Provided that the conditions and forms of such contracts, and the powers of the officer aforesaid in respect to passing them, are in all respects identical with the conditions and forms of the contracts, and the powers of the Magistrate passing such contracts, as determined by this Ordinance.

(2). Provided further that when any person on the Islands desires to enter into a written contract of service such contract may be passed in the Island before the Magistrate, and shall be in the same form and subject to the same conditions as the contract herein provided.

Contracts of serrice. 10. (1). Written contracts of service shall be in the form of Schedule B, (which may be amended by the Regulations),

Came into force on yth July 1904 (su Proclamation 30 of same date)

I have the honour to transmit to you the accompanying copy of a report from Mr. Maurice Rousset, Acting Magistrate for Mauritius and the Lesser Dependencies; on a visit which he made to Diego Garcia, Peros Banhos and Salomon Islands in May 1939. These Islands were last visited in October, 1938 and the Magistrate's report on that visit was forwarded with my despatch No. 47 of the 3rd February, 1939.

- 2. The local Agents of the groups of Islands visited have been furnished with copies of the various portions of the Report which require attention.
- 3. A copy of paragraph 3 of the Magistrate's General Remarks regarding Health and Sanitation was communicated to the Director of the Medical and Health Department who reports that it will not be possible to arrange for the Dispenser-Stewards of the Islands to undergo a course of practical instruction in the duties of Sanitary Inspectors. The name of a suitable text book, a study of which it is considered will enable them to dispose of all normal sanitary problems, will be communicated/

ENCLOSURE TO MATERITATE DESPATCH No. 9 OF 4.1.40

Report of Mr. Magistrate M. Rousset on the Chagos Group.

Departure.

1.- In compliance with instructions received from the Hon.Procureur General, I left Mauritius on 22.5.39 on board S.S. "Zambezia", 879 tons register.

A.Nicolin , master, M.Ross Mate.

Arrival. 2.- I arrived at Pointe de l'Est, Diego Island, on 38/5, in the early morning.

Last visit. 3.- Diego Island had been last visited by Mr. Magistrate
M.Lavoipierre in October, 1938.

Manager. 4.- Mr. Lois Dumee. Assistant Mr. Charoux.

Population. 5.- On my arrival the population consisted of 157 men, 177 women, 82 boys and 74 girls.

Civil status.6.- The Civil Status registers examined by me showed that from October 1938 to June 1939 10 births have been registered.

Deaths. 7.- 12 deaths have been registered during the same period.

Stiff births. 8.- Two still births were registered.

Marriages 9.- Five marriages have been celebrated since last visit.

Causes of 10.- Causes of death were registered to be: Pneumonia (2);

Causes of death were registered to be: Pneumonia (2);

Dysentry (1); Septicaemia (2): Intestinal Haemorrhage

(1): Infantile debility (1).

Remarks.

11.- As a whole I found that the Civil Status registers were kept in a fairly good way. I had to correct or rectify only two acts.

Live stock.

As far as could be ascertained at the time 12.of my visit the annimals numbered 60 asses, 40 horses, 68 pigs and poultry.

On all the Islands I visited fresh meat is sold to the population at least once a week at about 0.25cs per 1b.

Prison.

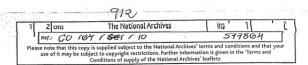

I visited the prison building which I found 13.clean. Invariably all the buildings on these islands are given a fresh coat of paint in expectation of the Magistrate's arrival.

An enquiry revealed that in all cases prisoners confined in the cells have received treatment as provided by law. I examined the prison register and approved of various sentences of imprisonment inflicted by the Manager. 3 cases of disturbance (quarrel in camp) and one case of insubordination were dealt with and the delinquents were sentenced to undergo short terms of imprisonment ranging from one to six days imprisonment. I have been satisfied that in no case the Manager abused his powers.

Administration 14.- I received only one complaint. On the morning of justice. of our departure a labourer complained to me that his shed had been broken open and various articles (rice, utensils etc) had been stolen. In spite of close searches made under my own supervision and guidance no satisfactory evidence could be gathered.

> The victim of this larceny had come from a camp situate at about 5 miles from the main establishment for purposes of loading the ship. I urged on the manager the necessity of having a watchman to keep constant watch of uninhabited huts during absence of their occupants at work else such occurrences would be bound to recur. A labourer was suspected of being the author of the larceny; it appeared that he had been dismissed from service some time ago for gross misconduct and had managed to return on the island by some means or other. As the presence of this man on the island was a source of trouble to the manager and to his fellow labourers he was ordered to return to Mauritius.

Hospital

15.- The hospital was clean and well kept and was under the care of a new warder. I visited the hospital daily and paid close attention to the work done by the dispenser whom I found efficient and industrious. It was a moving sight to see her centenarians coming every afternoon to rest in the hospital bed when they are given tea; one of them was suffering from "cateract"; in spite of all persuasive argument and sollicitations the old man refused obstinately to come to Mauritius when I tried to convince him that he could successfully be operated upon. He refused, saying that he preferred to die on his island and be buried together with his wife.

Register.

16.- The hospital register was kept up to date and showed that from October 1258 to June 1959, 88 patients were admitted for treatment, the commonest diseases being influenza, ankylostamiasis (amonst adults) dysentry.

POINTE MARIANNE

25-Diego Island comprises two establishments for purposes of facilitating and dividing the work, the one at Pointe de l'Est being the main establishment, the other being at Pointe Marianne, situate on the other side of the bay, at a distance of about two miles. On my arrival the manager of this establishment received order to go to Peros group and was replaced by Mr. A.Talbot.

About 15 or 20 men are employed and reside on this establishment.

26.- I found the camp in a state of abandonment and the house threatening ruin and an imminent fall. Most of them were supported by poles. I urged on the new manager that such a state of matters should not be allowed to obtain and that the houses should be attended to immediately. I also impressed on the manager the necessity of sending the dispenser of Diego establishment at least once a week to Pointe Marianne where labourers would consult him.

PART II

Peros Banhos Group.

Arrival.

27.- I left Diego Island on the 2nd of June last and reached Peros on the next day.

The headquarters of this group are on Ile de Coin which is at a distance of about 130 miles from Diego Garcia.

29.- On my arrival the population numbered:-Adults ... 75 boys

Males ... 100

Adults ... 78 girls

Females... 89 3 men, 3 women and 3 children arrived by S.S.Zambezia.

Civil Status -29.- The Civil Status registers examined by me showed that from October 1938 to June 1939 -

Births 13, 1 still birth and 4 deaths were registered.

Cause of death 30- The causes of death were reported to be Bronchitis, nutritis and tetanus.

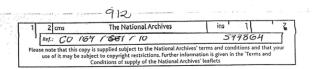

Marriages. 31.- No marriage was celebrated since last visit.

Hospital

32.- I examined the hospital building which I found very clean. Some bed sheets were old and torn; the dispenser Mr. H.Zeiia told me he had ordered a new set.

The surgical instruments were clean and neat. The register was kept up to date of my visit. 25 persons were admitted for treatment. The diseases treated including cases of lying-in were abdominal pains, wounds of minor character, abscesses, dyspepsia, hepatitis, fractures, influenza, lumbago, nutritis and rhumatism. The midwife attached to the hospital was suffering from tuberculosis and had to go back to Mauritius, in the meantime the dispenser's wife is performing her duties with even more competency.

33.- The pharmacy was well stocked at the date of my arrival, the value of drugs etc in stock was about Rs.500. Another Rs.84 worth of medicine arrived by S.S.Zambezia.

I have been told that great difficulty is experienced in finding competent midwives to work on the island on account of the unattractive pay they receive Rs. 12 per mensem, I believe.

When I last visited this island in 1936, I had been most unfortunately impressed by the look and unhealthy appearance of the children. I record my appreciation of the good work performed by the dispenser, Mr. Madeleine, who has succeeded in eliminating ankylostomiasis by generous distribution of "chenopod" and "ricin" oil. Only a few adults are now suffering from this disease which has worked so much havoc in the past amongst the inhabitant.

Cause of death. 54.-

54.- The cause of death was reported to be Bronchitis, Intestinal obstruction.

Pharmacy.

55.- The value of medicine, drugs etc in stock at time of my visit was about Rs.300. Another Rs.154.55 worth was just landed.

Live stock.

56.- As far as could be ascertained the animals on the island were:

60 pigs, 7 horses, 24 asses, poultry, 10 sheep, 1 cow, 2 bulls and 2 heifers.

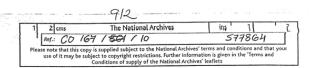

Camp.

57.- I visited the camp which I found very clean and well kept.

The camp has been rebuilt entirely on modern lines and the wooden houses look pretty and comfortable.

Administration of Justice.

58.- I dealt with two cases during my stay . One was a case of attempt at wounds and blows on the person of a commandaur (one local sirdar). Being given the trifling nature of this offence and the particular circumstances of this case I sentenced the accused to pay a fine of Rs.5, with costs. The evidence adduced disclosed that on the occasion of the new year the male population indulged in prolonged libations in the course of which a quarrel broke out between victim and the accused.

The second case was one of wounds and blows inflicted by a labourer on his paramour. He pleaded guilty and was fined Rs.10, with costs. These amounts have been handed to the Assistant District Clerk IInd Division to be paid to the Treasury.

Prison.

59.- The prison building was clean. The prison register showed that since last visit no sentence had been inflicted by the manager.

Exports

60.- Since last visit 387 tons of coprah have been exported.

PART IV Six Islands.

61.- Only recently there used to be a permanent establishment on this small group.

As it proved too costly the Company has decided to close tt down, as a separate establishment. It now depends on Solomon group for purposes of control and administration. At the time of my visit there were 8 men working on these islands: I met them on their return to Salomon Islands; all were content and happy.

A nice little vessel plies every month between the islands and bring the labourers back to their headquarters where they received their pay and rations.

PART V General Remarks.

This time, a good weather permitting I availed myself of every opportunity afforded to me to collect as much material on matters connected with the well being of the islands and the welfare of the inhabitant.

Much praise is due to Reverend Father R.Dussercle for his good and generous work for the moral and spiritual welfare of the labourers on the islands.

From the day of the arrival of the ship up to very day on which she leaves this kind-hearted and very zealous missionary is to be seen constantly and freely mixing with the labourers of the island with a view to making them profit by benefit of christian teaching.

It is in no small measure due to his excellent work on the islands that ${\tt discipline}$ and well behaviour of the labourers is so good.

Work

1. Boys and girls start to work at the age of 16.

Until they are physically strong enough to perform the work of adults, they are given same work as female labourers. The men, women and children camp on islands adversa female labourers and the younger on clearing work; the task set set is 10 "gaulettes" (of 10 feet each) per day. The task of the men consists in collecting and husking from about 500 to 600 coco muts per day. A good worker can collect and husk about 1000 muts per day and thus earn extra wages.

The men earn R.5 per mensem for their task; the boys and women get Rs.6. A bonus of R.1 per mensem is given to those who work full time. Those other labourers who stay permanently on the main establishment also collect and husk nuts and are otherwise employed in the manufacture of coprah.

Those rendered unfit for labour by age or illness are given a pension of Rs.3.- per mensem and also receive rations.

Oarsmen

2.— There are two teams of oarsmen on each island (main).

They ply every day between the main establishment and the adjoining islands to carry nets acrosss the legoon. Their tasks consists in carrying 2000 nuts per day; an average of 5000 is easily carried. The boats used by them are locally made by competent marine carpenters and are of remarkable build. Except for a certain season of the year the sea is generally smooth.

From what I saw an average worker may easily earn Rs.20 per mensem. When the earnings of the wife and children are added to that of the head of the family the amount is more than sufficient to keep the whole family comfortably.

5.- On the whole the population on the island is now sanitation.

3.- On the whole the population on the island is now very healthy. The men are of a fine and strong build especially at Peros and Solomon islands where most of them have been born. An ill-defined disease had prevailed until recently and was commonly termed " guim-guimbe": the people suffering from it felt weak in the limbs and were About two years ago Dr. Barbeau visited slack at work. the islands at the fequest of the agent in Mauritius and he came to the conclusion that this disease was the "dingue" fever, well known in Mauritius. He prescribed tonics and the consequential result is that now this disease has disappeared. I was also pleased to find that ankylostamiases had almost been eliminated. This gratifying state of affairs can only be maintained by constant supervision on the part of the dispenser who should take preventive measures and to exert sanitary control.

The state of things would be made better if the dispenser stewards were subjected to a special training and underwent a course of practical instruction in the duties of sanitary inspector; they would then be in a position to give reliable advice on sanitary subject and disseminate the knowledge of elementary hygiene practice: Almost all confinements were conducted in the hospitals. The distary in hospitals consists of chicken, bread, tea, milk and sago.

Water.

4.- The water collected from wells in the camp is of good quality; up to the present day there has been no outbreak of disease attributable to water-born injection. I think it would be unnecessary to impose on the company to provide each but with its own water saving cistern; the population would not use them.

Agriculture.

5.- Vegetables obtainable all the year round are "langue de vache", pumpkins and bredes. There are also plenty of bananas and lemons. Each hut is provided with a small garden but unfortunately the labourers, all of negro stock are reluctant to till the soil. This voyage a mission of scientists composed of Messrs Guerandel and P.O.Wiehe and F.E.Lionnet visited the island at the request of Mr. B.Lionnet the agent in Mauritius. I have no doubt that their report, especially on the more practical subject, will result in most beneficial effect. For instance use of guano available on the island would bring the soil into a state of greater fatility and gardens would maintain a steady supply of vegetables.

and 239 people

to experiment in the raising of dairy cattle there exist at present on Solomon Island one bull, one cow and two heifers. The cow, at the time of my visit, was giving about 8 bottles of milk daily. I congratulated the Government Veterinary Surgeon, Dr.F.E.Lionnet for the care and pains taken by him in order to supply the island with fresh milk. During last visit he supplied to the manager all possible information concerning the feeding of the animals. I had long talks with this officer on the subject of rearing cattle on the islands and he told me that after careful investigation he thought that the conditions prevailing on them would render them suitable sites for breading centres. I have always though that the question of fresh milk supply should be one of the aims of a competent manager. I was pleased to see that the milk supply at Solomon Island was sufficient enough to allow of milk being sold at a very reasonable price to the inhabitants.

6.- As a result of recommendations made in 1936 relative

Arrival.

7.- I left Diego Island on the 14th of June and arrived at Port Louis on the 20th instant.

Soon after we had left Diego harbour a leak was detected. It seems as if that before the boat is allowed to proceed out to sea a sufficient examination of its hull is not made with the result that on any one of these trips a disaster may occur.

Before concluding my report I beg to report my appreciation of the courtesy extended to me by the manager, the agent in Mauritius, Mr. Richard Lionnet as well as by the captain, officers and other members of the crew.

The Atlantic Charter (14 Aug. 1941)

Atlantic Charter

AUGUST 14, 1941

The President of the United States of America and the Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, representing His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, being met together, deem it right to make known certain common principles in the national policies of their respective countries on which they base their hoppes for a better future for the world.

First, their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorial or other;

Second, they desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned;

Third, they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them;

Fourth, they will endeavor, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all States, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity;

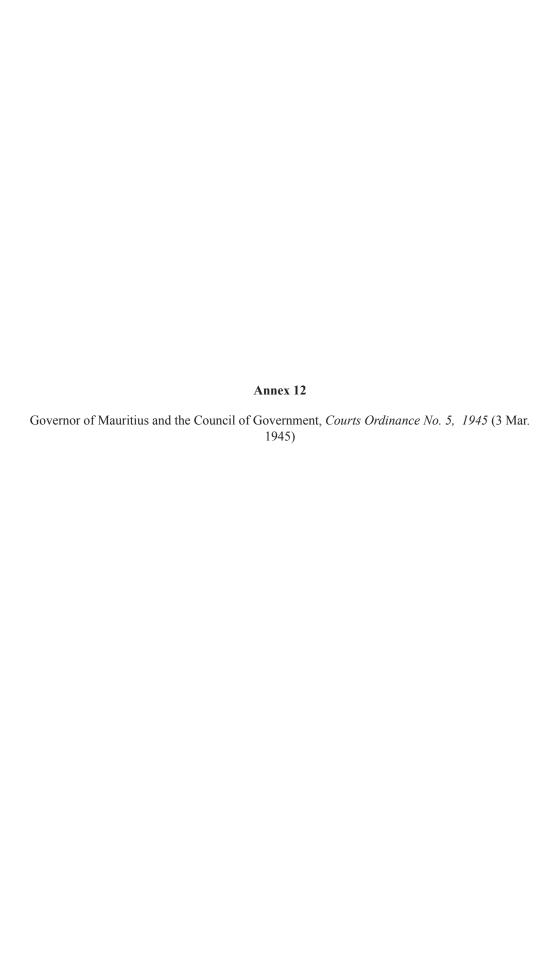

Fifth, they desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labor standards, economic advancement and social security;

Sixth, after the final destruction of the Nazi tyranny, they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want;

Seventh, such a peace should enable all men to traverse the high seas and oceans without hindrance;

Eighth, they believe that all of the nations of the world, for realistic as well as spiritual reasons must come to the abandonment of the use of force. Since no future peace can be maintained if land, sea or air armaments continue to be employed by nations which threaten, or may threaten, aggression outside of their frontiers, they believe, pending the establishment of a wider and permanent system of general security, that the disarmament of such nations is essential. They will likewise aid and encourage all other practicable measure which will lighten for peace-loving peoples the crushing burden of armaments.

Governor's reserved

- 27.—(1) If the Governor shall consider that it is expedient in the interests of public order, public faith or good government (which expressions shall, without prejudice to their generality, include the responsibility of the Colony as a component part of the British Empire, and all matters pertaining to the creation or abolition of any public office or to the appointment, salary or other conditions of service of any public officer) that any Bill introduced, or any motion proposed, in the Council should have effect, then, if the Council fail to pass such a Bill or motion within such time and in such form as the Governor may think reasonable and expedient, the Governor, at any time in his discretion, may, notwithstanding any provisions of this Order or of any Standing Orders of the Council, elclare that such Bill or motion shall have effect as if it had been passed by the Council, either in the form in which it was so introduced or proposed or with such amendments as the Governor shall think fit which have been moved or proposed in the Council or in any Committee thereof; and thereupon the said Bill or motion shall have effect as if it had been so passed, and, in the case of any such Bill, the provisions of this Order relating to assent to Bills and disallowance of laws shall apply accordingly.

 (2) The Governor shall forthwith report to a Secretary of State every case in which
- (2) The Governor shall forthwith report to a Secretary of State every case in which he shall make any such declaration and the reasons therefor.
- (3) If any Member objects to any declaration made under this section, he may, within seven days of the making thereof, submit to the Governor a statement in writing of his reasons for so objecting, and a copy of such statement shall, if furnished by such Member, be forwarded by the Governor as soon as practicable to a Secretary of State.
- (4) Any such declaration, other than a declaration relating to a Bill, may be revoked by a Secretary of State and the Governor shall cause notice of such revocation to be published in the Gazette; and from the date of such notification any motion, which shall have had effect by virtue of the declaration revoked, shall cease to have effect and the provisions of subsection (2) of section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1869, shall apply to such revocation as they apply to the repeal of an Act of Parliament.

52 & 53 Vict. c. 63, cea

Assent to Bills.

- 28.—(1) No Bill shall become a law until either the Governor shall have assented thereto in His Majesty's name and on His Majesty's behalf and shall have signed the same in token of such assent, or His Majesty shall have given his assent thereto through a Secretary of State.
- (2) When a Bill is presented to the Governor for his assent, he shall, according to his discretion but subject to the provisions of this Order and of any Instructions addressed to him under His Majesty's Sign Manual and Signet or through a Secretary of State, declare that he assents, or refuses to assent, thereto, or that he reserves the Bill for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure:

Provided that the Governor shall reserve for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure any Bill by which any provision of this Order is revoked or amended or which is in any way repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the provisions of this Order, unless he shall have been authorized by a Secretary of State to assent thereto.

- (3) A law assented to by the Governor shall come into operation on the day on which such assent shall be given, or if it shall be enacted, either in the law or in some other enactment (including any enactment in force on the appointed day), that it shall come into operation on some other date, on that date.

 (4) A Bill reserved for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure shall become a law as soon as His Majesty shall have givined such assent by Proclamation published in the Gazette. Every such law shall come into operation on the date of such Proclamation or, if it shall be enacted, either in the law or in some other enactment (including any enactment in force on the appointed day), that it shall come into operation on some other date, on that date.

Disallowance of

- 29.—(1) Any law to which the Governor shall have given his assent may be disallowed by His Majesty through a Secretary of State.
- (2) Whenever any law has been disallowed by His Majesty, the Governor shall use notice of such disallowance to be published in the Gazette.

(3) Every law so disallowed shall cease to have effect as soon as notice of such disallowance shall be published as aforesaid and thereupon any enactment repealed or amended by, or in pursuance of, the law disallowed shall have effect as if such law had not been made. Subject as aforesaid, the provisions of subsection (2) of 52 & 53 Vict. c. 63. section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, shall apply to such disallowance as they apply to the repeal of an Act of Parliament.

- 30. Subject to the provisions of this Order, the Governor and the Council Royal Instructions shall, in the transaction of business and the making of laws, conform as nearly as may be to the directions contained in any Instructions under His Majesty's Sign Manual and Signet which may from time to time be addressed to the Governor in that behalf.
- 31.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this Order and of any Instructions under Standing Orders. His Majesty's Sign Manual and Signet, the Council may from time to time make, amend and revoke Standing Orders for the regulation and orderly conduct of its own proceedings and the despatch of business, and for the passing, intituling and numbering of Bills, and for the presentation thereof to the Governor for assent, but no such Standing Orders shall have effect until they shall have been approved by the Governor.
- (2) The first Standing Orders of the Council shall be made by the Governor and may be amended or revoked by the Council under subsection (1) of this section.
- 32. The official language of the Council shall be English but any Member Official language. may address the chair in French.
- 33. Subject to the provisions of this Order and of the Standing Orders of the Introduction of Council, any Member may introduce any Bill or propose any motion for debate in, or may present any petition to, the Council, and the same shall be debated and disposed of according to Standing Orders:

Provided that, except with the recommendation or consent of the Governor signified thereto, the Council shall not proceed upon any Bill, amendment, motion or petition, which in the opinion of the Governor or other Member presiding, would.

- (a) dispose of or charge any public revenue or public funds of the Colony, or revoke or alter any disposition thereof or charge thereon, or impose, alter or repeal any rate, tax or duty; or
- (b) suspend the Standing Orders of the Council or any of them.
- 34. Except for the purpose of enabling this section to be complied with, no Oath of Allegiance. Member of the Council shall sit or vote therein until he shall have taken and subscribed before the Governor, or some person authorized by the Governor in that behalf, the Oath of Allegiance in the form set out in the Third Schedule to this Order:

Provided that every person authorized by the law of the Colony to make an affirmation instead of taking an oath in legal proceedings may make such affirmation in like terms instead of the said oath.

- 35.—(1) The sittings of the Council shall be held at such times and places as Sittings and the Governor shall from time to time appoint by Proclamation published in the Sessions. Gazette. There shall be a session of the Council once at least in every year, so that a period of twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting in one session and the first sitting in the next session.
- (2) The first session of the Council shall commence within six months of the appointed day.
- 36.—(1) The Governor may at any time, by Proclamation published in the Prorogation and Gazette, prorogue or dissolve the Council.
- (2) The Governor shall dissolve the Council at the expiration of five years from the date of the return of the first writ at the last preceding general election, if it shall not have been sooner dissolved.
- 37. There shall be a general election at such time within four months after the General Elections, appointed day, and thereafter within three months after every dissolution of the Council, as the Governor shall by Proclamation published in the Gazette direct.

MISCELLANEOUS

Penalty for unqualified persons sitting or voting.

- 38 .-- (1) Any person who---
- (a) having been appointed or elected a Member of the Council but not having been, at the time of such appointment or election, qualified to be so appointed or elected, shall sit or vote in the Council, or
- (b) shall sit or vote in the Council after his seat thereon has become vacant or he has become disqualified from sitting or voting therein, knowing, or having reasonable grounds for knowing, that he was so disqualified, or that his seat has become vacant, as the case may be, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred rupees for every day upon which he so sits or votes.
- (2) The said penalty shall be recoverable by action in the Supreme Court of the Colony at the suit of the Procureur and Advocate General.

Provisions necessary to give effect to the Order.

- 39.—(1) At any time before the appointed day the Council of Government constituted by the existing Letters Patent may by laws made under those Letters Patent, and thereafter at any time before the first sitting of the Council under this Order the Governor may by Proclamation, make such provision as appears to them or to him (as the case may be) to be necessary or expedient for giving effect to the provisions of this Order and in particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power may make provision for all or any of the matters specified in section 18 of this Order; and the expression "any law for the time being in force in the Colony", wherever it occurs in this Order, shall include any law or Proclamation made under this subsection.
- (2) It shall not be necessary for any law enacted in accordance with the provisions of subsection (1) of this section to be reserved for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure.
- (3) Every Proclamation made under subsection (1) of this section shall have the force of law and may be amended, added to or revoked by further Proclamation within the period specified in that subsection.
 - (4) This section shall come into operation forthwith.

Emoluments.

- 40.—(1) The Governor and other Officers mentioned in the Fourth Schedule to this Order shall receive by way of annual emoluments the sums respectively specified therein and the said sums are hereby charged on the revenues of the Colony and shall be paid by the Accountant General out of the said revenues upon warrant directed to him under the hand of the Governor.
- (2) Nothing in subsection (1) of this section shall prevent the payment to the Governor or to any of the Officers aforesaid of any greater or other sums by way of salary or other emoluments for which provision may be duly made from time to time.
- (3) In this section and the Fourth Schedule to this Order the word "Governor" means the person for the time being holding the substantive appointment of Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

Removal of difficulties.

4.1.—(1) If any difficulty shall arise in bringing into operation any of the provisions of this Order or in giving effect to the purposes thereof, a Secretary of State may, by Order, make such provision as seems to him necessary or expedient for the purpose of removing the difficulty and may by such Order amend or add to any provision of this Order:

Provided that no Order shall be made under this section later than the first day of January, 1950.

- (2) Any Order made under this section may be amended, added to, or revoked by a further Order, and may be given retrospective effect to a day not earlier than the date of this Order.
 - (3) This section shall come into operation forthwith.

Power reserved to His Majesty.

- 42.—(1) His Majesty hereby reserves to Himself, His Heirs and Successors power, with the advice of His or Their Privy Council, to amend, add to or revoke this Order as to Him or Them shall seem fit.
- (2) Nothing in this Order shall affect the power of His Majesty in Council to make laws from time to time for the peace, order and good government of the Colony.

Draft of Position Paper From Background Book for Colonial Policy Discussions

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] June 21, 1950.

ITEM III, A, 2—Submission of Political Information to the United NATIONS

BACKGROUND

The problem of the submission of political information to the United Nations by Members administering non-self-governing territories was first discussed at the San Francisco Conference.

Article 73 of the Charter had its genesis at that time in a draft general declaration on colonial policy presented by the United Kingdom to which the Australian Delegation submitted an amendment. This amendment provided for reports upon a specified list of economic, social and educational topics, and, in some cases, at the direction of the General Assembly, reports on political development were to be required. In the redrafts of this amendment the United States combined the two types of reporting and included political information, the United Kingdom omitted reporting, and Australia retained reporting but dropped political information. The U.S.S.R. favored political reporting. The United States in its second redraft of this amendment, however, omitted political information and in the final formulation, political information was not included although there is no full record of the circumstances surrounding the eventual decision on this matter.

From the time of the First Session of the General Assembly, the question of submitting information on political conditions in nonself-governing territories has arisen regularly. In Subcommittee 2 of the Fourth Committee, First Session, it was agreed that such information was of great importance and much to be desired. No action was taken on this question, however, until the Ad Hoc Committee submitted a draft proposal which, after the defeat in the plenary session of a U.S.S.R. amendment which would recommend the submission of information on local participation in administration, was adopted by the General Assembly as Resolution 144 (II). This resolution notes the voluntary submission of political information by some Members and considers it to be in conformity with the Charter and, therefore, to be noted and encouraged. At the same session the Assembly adopted Resolution 142 (II) to which was annexed the Standard Form, the optional Part I of which covers items of a political nature. In the Special Committee, 1948, it was noted that Australia, Denmark, New Zealand, Netherlands, France (for Morocco and Tunisia) and the United States had voluntarily submitted political information.

At the Third Session of the General Assembly two resolutions were adopted relevant to this question: Resolution 218 (III) which provides, inter alia, for Secretariat summaries of voluntarily submitted political information and invites information on items in Part I of the Standard Form other than government from those Members who had not previously submitted such information; and Resolution 222 (III) which requests Members concerned to communicate information of a constitutional nature in cases where they have ceased to report on territories under Article 73(e).

The Special Committee, 1949, submitted a draft proposal which recalled the provisions of Resolution 144 (II) and expressed the hope that such Members as had not done so would voluntarily include political information in their reports. This was adopted by the Assembly as Resolution 327 (IV) after an amendment which provided that in revision of the Standard Form information on geography, history, peoples, and human rights should cease to be classified as optional and expressed the hope that information on government would be voluntarily submitted. Attempts by the U.S.S.R., both in the Special Committees and in various sessions of the Assembly, to make the submission of political information mandatory have been consistently defeated by sizeable majorities.

DISCUSSION

The question of submission of political information has not only been debated on its own merits but as an ancillary factor in other disputes. In addition to the principal issue based upon the interpretation of Article 73(e), the submission of political information has arisen in connection with the general consideration of the purposes for which information is transmitted under Article 73(e), and specifically with regard to its use in defining and applying the term "non-self-governing". It has also become a major aspect of the proposed revision of the Standard Form.

As a problem, per se, the question of submitting political information has involved two interpretative positions: on one hand, the nonadministering powers have maintained that Article 73 must be read as a whole. They pointed out that sub-paragraph (a) deals with political, as well as economic, social, and educational advancement and that sub-paragraph (b) deals specifically with the development of self-government and political institutions. The more extreme view, held by the U.S.S.R., its satellites and Egypt, maintains, therefore, that submission of political information is mandatory under their interpretation of Article 73. The less extreme view, in which India takes the lead with the support of the majority of the non-administering group, has agreed, however, that political information is not mandatory under Article 73(e), but has strongly supported its inclusion on a voluntary basis, pointing out that political considerations cannot be divorced from economic, social and educational factors, and stressing that sub-paragraph (e) should be given a broad interpretation within the larger context of the Article. On the other hand, by a strictly literal interpretation of the Article, it has been maintained that the obligations enumerated in the sub-paragraphs other than (e) are of a general type, conditioned by the nature of Chapter XI as a declaration; whereas, sub-paragraph (e) states a specific obligation clearly limited and circumscribed.

In connection with discussions as to the purposes in general for which information is transmitted, it should be noted that, while the language of Article 73(e) states that information transmitted thereunder is for information purposes, the terms of reference of the first and subsequent Special Committees have provided for the examination of the summaries and analyses of information transmitted on economic, social and educational conditions and for reports including procedural and substantive recommendations relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to specific territories. Such political information as may be voluntarily submitted, however, is not mentioned in these terms of reference, and the problem has arisen as to the use of this information, particularly as a procedural question of the competence of the Special Committee to discuss and analyze the information, discuss the action of those Members who voluntarily submit such information, and criticize the action of those Members who do not. The non-administering powers have taken the position that political information, voluntarily submitted, is admissible for discussion and recommendation in the Special Committee, as well as the General Assembly, but they have not challenged the general proviso that such recommendations shall not deal with specific territories.

This general problem of the purpose of political information and the competence of the General Assembly in respect to it has found particular expression as an aspect of the issue of defining the term "non-self-governing" for the purposes of Chapter XI. If the right of the General Assembly not only to determine, but also to apply such a definition is granted, then it can be argued that such a right militates in favor of the obligatory submission of political information, at least for the purpose of determining the status of territories under Chapter XI. If, however, it is agreed that political reporting is voluntary only, questions arise as to (a) the competence of the General Assembly to utilize voluntarily submitted political information in its discussion of a general definition of the term non-self-governing, and (b) its competence to discuss the status of particular territories on which political information is voluntarily submitted.

In discussions on the Standard Form and its revision, the problem of submission of political information has been a primary consideration. No new factors are involved in this aspect of the problem, however, and essentially the anticipated revision of the Standard Form represents a means for securing a wider interpretation of Article 73. The General Assembly has recommended (Resolution 327 (IV)), that in revision of the Standard Form the optional classification be removed from items in Part I other than government. This was strongly supported by the moderate non-administering Members. In this connection it should be noted that the Standard Form, as a whole, was annexed to Resolution 142 (II) for the guidance of reporting Members and is, therefore, optional in its entirety.

POSITIONS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, FRANCE, AND BELGIUM

On the question of interpretation of Article 73, the United Kingdom has taken a consistently firm position insisting upon a most literal and strict adherence to the language of the Article. This position regards Chapter XI as a unilateral declaration of intent and the obligations mentioned in Article 73 as consisting of two types: general obligations as stated in sub-paragraphs (a), (b), (c), and (d), and a very specific and limited obligation as stated in sub-paragraph (e). This position obviously excludes any consideration of the proposition that submission of political information is mandatory in view of the general intent and language of Chapter XI and Article 73. In addition, the United Kingdom has opposed the provision of such information on a mandatory or voluntary basis, claiming that (a) the matter was considered and rejected at San Francisco, (b) such a move constitutes an extra-legal attempt to rewrite the Charter, and (c) there is a difference between the public discussion through normal constitutional processes and the interference of international agencies in matters which concern only the United Kingdom and its colonial peoples. In addition to opposing voluntary submission, the United Kingdom has stated that it would not conform to such a proposal were it adopted. Belgium has supported this position throughout and has stated that it would only consider changing this interpretation after a decision by the International Court of Justice. Belgium has also held that under Article 55 signatories of the Charter were bound to improve conditions generally but were not expected to furnish information as to whether they were doing so.

France has opposed attempts to interpret Article 73 in the broad sense which would make political reporting on non-self-governing territories mandatory. It has, however, supported voluntary submission at the discretion of the reporting Member, although it has reserved its position on further submission of such information on French territories in view of the decision of the Special Committee, 1949, that discussion of such information was admissible.

Other administering Members, including Australia, New Zealand, Netherlands, Denmark and the United States have supported the position that submission of political information is voluntary under the terms of Article 73(e).

On the related question of the purposes for which information is transmitted and the use to which it can be put, the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, and the Netherlands have taken the position that they are not prepared to discuss political or constitutional matters in the Special Committee or in any other organ of the United Nations; and, in addition, they have opposed the competence of the Special Committee to consider and make recommendations upon the general subject of voluntary submission. In taking this view, they have reasserted the argument that information, including that voluntarily submitted, is for information purposes only and not to be discussed nor could resolutions be recommended concerning it.

However, in opposing Resolution 222 (III), the United Kingdom stated that, while it always made public any constitutional changes, [as a result of which it ceased to report on a territory], and had always furnished and would continue to furnish to the library of the United Nations full details on such changes, in its view it was not required at any stage to bring officially to the notice of the Secretary General the constitutional instruments providing for such changes in such a way that the information would become a matter for discussion in the United Nations. This latter position would seem to imply that information officially transmitted, presumably including voluntary political information, is admissible for discussion in the United Nations. France has stated that it was quite probable that it would not supply political information since the competence of the Special Committee in this matter was decided affirmatively.

It would appear that the administering powers, while originally opposing discussion, reports, and recommendations on information on economic, social, and educational conditions, have acquiesced in these cases but attempted to maintain their original position in regard to voluntarily submitted political information. The United Kingdom and France abstained on the proposal providing for Secretariat summaries of such information and inviting information on Part I other than item (d): government (Resolution 218 (III)).

On the question of definition of the term non-self-governing, with which the problem of submission of political information has become involved, the colonial powers have not objected in principle to the right of the Assembly under Article 10 to attempt such a definition. Their opposition, however, has been most strong on the question of determination of the status of any specific territory under Chapter XI. The relevance of political information to this problem arises principally in connection with the sources of information which the Assembly or the Special Committee might use in their discussions. Consistent with their position against the application of any definition by the Assembly, the United Kingdom, France and Belgium have opposed the official submission or discussion of political information for the purpose of determining the status of any non-selfgoverning territory under Chapter XI. The United Kingdom, France, and Belgium abstained on Resolution 222 (III) under the provisions of which the United Nations considers it essential that it be informed of constitutional changes by virtue of which information is no longer transmitted and requests communication of appropriate information on the constitutional status and the relationship with the metropole of such territories. France has complied with the provisions of this resolution; the United Kingdom has not. On another occasion, the United Kingdom stated that the question of the constitutional relationship between the metropolitan powers and their territories was a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the powers concerned. The latter contention is consistent with the United Kingdom interpretation of Article 2(7) that discussion and recommendation by the United Nations may constitute interference in matters within domestic jurisdiction.2

 $^{^2}$ The Department drafted a separate position paper on this subject, "Recourse to the domestic jurisdiction clause of the Charter" (Item III, D, 3, b), not printed.

On the question of the Standard Form which is related to the problem of submission of political information by virtue of the optional Part I of the Form, the colonial powers voted in favor of Resolution 142 (II) to which the Form was annexed for the guidance of Members. Belgium, however, made general reference at that time to the tendency to illegally revise the Charter, pointing particularly to the provisions of Part I. The United Kingdom's only reservation was on the practical grounds that compilation of reports should not interfere with the substantive work in non-self-governing territories. In the Fourth Committee, Fourth Session, the United Kingdom opposed, as did Belgium and France, Resolution 327 (IV) which provides, inter alia, that in revision of the Form general information on geography, history, people and human rights should cease to be classified as optional. In so doing, the United Kingdom stated that it had agreed to include in its returns under Part I such supplementary information on these subjects as was necessary to a proper understanding of the information transmitted under Article 73(e) and that the description "optional" should continue to apply to Part I. This appears to represent a retrogression from the position taken by the United Kingdom in the Special Committee, 1948, where it opposed an invitation to Members to supply information on the items specified above, stating that it was not prepared to submit any information under the optional section, though it would include such information as it deemed necessary on the subjects therein other than government under Part II of the Form. It would appear that had the United Kingdom consistently maintained this earlier view, it should have supported the recommended revision of Part I. The United Kingdom also stated in 1948 that it was not prepared to have anything to do with Part I of the Form as such.

RECOMMENDED UNITED STATES POSITION

1. On the question of submission of political information as a problem, per se, the United States should adhere to its present position which, while recognizing that the submission of political information is not required under the provisions of Article 73(e), supports the voluntary transmission of such information by Members administering non-self-governing territories. In stating this position, the United States might point out that it wishes to secure the cooperation of all Members of the United Nations in a constructive and reasonable interpretation of Chapter XI, and that, to this end, it will continue to oppose attempts to interpret Article 73 in its widest sense as obligating the submission of political information, but similarly, it seeks to avoid the provocative results of a rigid insistence upon a narrow and literal interpretation of the obligation set forth in sub-paragraph (e). The United States representative might also call attention to the fact that only the U.S.S.R., its satellites and Egypt have insisted upon an interpretation which would make political reporting mandatory; whereas, a majority of the colonial and non-colonial powers have supported voluntary submission. Acceptance and implementation of the latter point of view by all colonial powers would, in the view of the United States, be tactically desirable as a possible means of preventing the strengthening of the extreme, U.S.S.R. position.

2. Should the question be raised as to the position of the United States on the use of or purpose for which political information is voluntarily submitted, the United States should state that, in relation to the Special Committee, it maintains the same position on its competence with regard to information voluntarily transmitted as on other information transmitted under Article 73(e), viz., that the Committee is competent to discuss, report, and make substantive and procedural recommendations upon functional fields generally, but not with respect to specific territories. The United States feels that such a position is consistent with (1) the voluntary character of such political information as is transmitted, (2) the request made by the General Assembly to the Secretary General to summarize and analyze such information, (3) the considerations which prompted the present procedure on social, economic and educational information, and (4) the provisions of Resolution 334 (IV) providing for the preliminary consideration by the Committee of the factors to be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not non-self-governing.

In respect to the General Assembly and the issue of defining "non-self-governing", the United States should reply that, while it does not consider that recognition of the right of the General Assembly to attempt such a definition alters the interpretation of Article 73 in such a way as to make submission of political information mandatory, it takes the view that the General Assembly is competent to utilize such political information as is voluntarily submitted in its discussion of a general definition. But the United States believes that the General Assembly should not make recommendations on specific territories to individual administering Members, irrespective of whether they had voluntarily submitted political information on those territories or not. The United States has consistently maintained that the submission of voluntary information in no way prejudices the right of administering Members to determine the status of their territories under Chapter XI.

3. Should the question of the proposed revision of the Standard Form arise, the United States should state that insofar as such revision would involve changes in the optional classification of items

- a, b, c and e under Part I, it considers that the provisions of paragraph 3, Resolution 327 (IV) should be complied with in view of (a) the essentially optional character of the Standard Form as a whole, (b) the fact that the General Assembly did not recommend that item (d): government, cease to be classified as optional, and (c) the principle, to which the United States subscribes, that resolutions of the General Assembly should be faithfully complied with by Members of the United Nations.
- 4. In commenting generally upon the voluntary submission of political information by Members administering non-self-governing territories, the United States representative might emphasize the importance of a broad and constructive approach to this problem, pointing out that it would appear desirable, in view of the essential nature of the United Nations and the spirit of the Charter, as well as for pressing, contemporary tactical considerations, that those countries who are most intimately associated with the development of democratic, constitutional government and whose experience has been widest in the problems of its evolution should take every opportunity to expound its virtues, discuss its problems, and answer its critics, especially in respect to those areas of the world where they have undertaken the responsibility to develop democratic self-government. To adopt other than a liberal, constructive attitude toward the discussion of fundamental political problems, even upon the soundest legal grounds, is to provide the opportunity for unjustified presuppositions and insinuations.

MAURITIUS

The Mauritius (Constitution) Order in Council, 1958

At the Count at Buckingham Palace, the 30th day of July, 1958

Present,

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council

Her Majesty, in exercise of the powers enabling Her in that behalf, is pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

PART I

Introductory

Citation and commencement

- 1.—(1) This Order may be cited as the Mauritius (Constitution) Order in Council, 1958.
- (2) This Order shall be published in the Gazette and, save as otherwise expressly provided in this Order, it shall come into operation on such day (hereinafter called "the appointed day") as the Governor, acting in his discretion, by Proclamation published in the Gazette shall appoint(a):

Provided that at any time after the making of this Order the boundaries of electoral districts may be fixed and electors may be registered in accordance with the provisions of sections 29, 30, 31 and 32 of this Order, and of any law enacted under the Mauritius (Electoral Provisions) Order in Council, 1958.

- 2.—(1) In this Order, unless the context otherwise requires-
- "the Colony" means the Island of Mauritius (including the small islands adjacent thereto) and the Dependencies of Mauritius;
- "the Gazette" means the Government Gazette of the Colony;
- "the Governor" means the Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony and includes the officer for the time being administering the Government and, to the extent to which a Deputy for the Governor is authorized to act, that Deputy;

"law" includes any instrument having the force of law made in exercise of a power conferred by a law;

"Municipal Corporation" includes a Town Council;

"public office" means, subject to the provisions of subsection (3) of this section, an office of emolument under the Crown or an office of emolument under a Municipal Corporation within the "public officer" means the holder of any public office and includes a person appointed to act in any public office;

"the Public Seal" means the Public Seal of the Colony;

"the public service" means the service of the Crown in respect of the government of the Colony;

"session" means the sittings of the Legislative Council com-mencing when the Council first meets after being constituted under this Order, or after its prorogation or dissolution at any time, and terminating when the Council is prorogued or is dissolved without having been prorogued;

"sitting" means a period during which the Legislative Council is sitting continuously without adjournment, and includes any period during which the Council is in committee;

"the Speaker" and "the Deputy Speaker" mean respectively the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of the Legislative Council;

"the Supreme Court" means the Supreme Court of the Colony.

(2) Any reference in this Order to the holder of an office by the term designating his office includes, to the extent of his authority, any person who is for the time being authorized to perform the functions

(3) (a) For the purposes of this Order a person shall not be deemed to be a public officer by reason of receiving—

(i) any salary or allowance as Speaker, Deputy Speaker, Minister, Acting Minister or as a member of the Legislative Council;

(ii) any salary or allowance as Mayor, Chairman or a member of a Municipal Corporation, or as the Standing Counsel or the Attorney of a Municipal Corporation;

(iii) a pension or other like allowance in respect of service under the Crown or under a Municipal Corporation.

(b) A provision in any law in force in the Colony that an office this Order shall have effect as if it were included in this Order.

(4) References in this Order to Her Majesty's dominions shall be construed as if they were references to all countries or territories within the Commonwealth.

(5) For the purposes of this Order the resignation of a member of any body or holder of any office established by this Order that is required to be addressed to any person shall be deemed to have effect from the time at which it is received by that person:

Provided that a resignation (other than the resignation of the Deputy Speaker) that is required to be addressed to the Speaker shall, if the office of Speaker is vacant, or the Speaker is absent from the Colony, be deemed to have effect from the time at which it is received by the Deputy Speaker on behalf of the Speaker.

- (6) For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that any person who has vacated his seat in any body, or has vacated any office, established by this Order may, if qualified, again be appointed or elected as a member of that body or to that office, as the case may be, from time to time.
- (7) Save as in this Order otherwise provided or required by the context, the Interpretation Act, 1889(a), shall apply for the purpose of interpreting this Order as it applies for the purpose of interpreting an Act of Parliament.

Revocation

3. The Orders in Council mentioned in the First Schedule to this Order are revoked, but this revocation shall not prejudice anything lawfully done thereunder, and in particular shall not affect the continued operation of any law in force in the Colony immediately before the appointed day.

PART II

Executive Council

Executive Council

- 4.—(1) There shall be an Executive Council for the Colony which, subject to the provisions of section 10 of this Order, shall consist of three ex officio members and nine appointed members.
- (2) The ex officio members and the appointed members shall be styled Ministers.

Functions of Executive Council and exercise of Governor's powers

- 5.—(1) The Executive Council shall be the principal instrument of policy and shall perform such functions and duties, and exercise such powers, as may from time to time be prescribed by or under this Order, any other Orders of Her Majesty in Council, any Instructions under Her Majesty's Sign Manual and Signet or, subject to the provisions of this Order and of such other Orders and Instructions as aforesaid, by any other law in force in the Colony.
- (2) The Governor shall, save as is otherwise provided by this Order or by any Instructions under Her Majesty's Sign Manual and Signet,—
 - (a) consult with the Executive Council in the exercise of all powers conferred upon him by this Order other than powers which he is by this Order directed or empowered to exercise in his discretion; and
 - (b) act in accordance with the advice of the Executive Council in any matter on which he is by this subsection obliged to consult with the Executive Council.

Ex officio members

6. The ex officio members of the Executive Council shall be the Colonial Secretary, the Attorney-General and the Financial Secretary.

Appointed members

7.—(1) The appointed members of the Executive Council shall be persons who are elected or nominated members of the Legislative Council and shall be appointed by the Governor, acting in his discretion, by Instrument under the Public Seal.

(2) The Governor shall forthwith report to Her Majesty through a Secretary of State the appointment of any person to be a member of the Executive Council.

Tenure of office of appointed members

8.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this Order, an appointed member of the Executive Council shall hold office as such during Her Majesty's

(2) An appointed member of the Executive Council shall vacate his office-

(a) when, after any dissolution of the Legislative Council, he is informed by the Governor that the Governor is about to reappoint him as a member of the Executive Council or to appoint another person in his place; or

(b) if he ceases to be a member of the Legislative Council otherwise than by reason of a dissolution of that Council; or

(c) if he resigns his office by writing under his hand addressed to the Governor; or

(d) if he is absent from the Colony without written permission given by the Governor, acting in his discretion.

Determination of questions as to membership

9. Any question whether any person is a member of the Executive Council shall be determined by the Governor, acting in his discretion.

Temporary members of the Executive Council

10.—(1) Whenever an ex officio or an appointed member of the Executive Council is unable, because of his illness or absence from the Colony, to perform his functions as a member of the Council, the Governor, acting in his discretion, may, by Instrument under the Public Seal, appoint a person to be temporarily a member of the Council:

Provided that he shall appoint a person who is a public officer in place of an ex officio member, and a person who is an elected or nominated member of the Legislative Council in place of an appointed

- (2) A person appointed under this section to be temporarily a member of the Executive Council—
 - (a) shall hold office as such during Her Majesty's pleasure;
 - (b) shall cease to hold office as such when he is notified by the Governor that the member in whose place he was appointed is again able to perform the functions of his office, or when the office of the member in whose place he was appointed becomes
- (3) The Governor shall forthwith report to a Secretary of State any appointment made under this section. 33444

- (4) Subject to the provisions of this section, the provisions of this Order shall apply in relation to a person appointed to be temporarily a member of the Executive Council—
 - (a) as they apply in relation to ex officio members, if he was appointed in place of such a member; and
 - (b) as they apply in relation to appointed members, if he was appointed in place of such a member.

Official oath

- 11. Before entering upon the functions of his office every ex officion member and every appointed member of the Executive Council and every person appointed to be temporarily a member of the Council shall make and subscribe before the Governor, or some other person authorized in that behalf by the Governor, an oath for the due execution of that office in the following form:—

Provided that every person authorized by law to make an affirmation instead of an oath in legal proceedings may, instead of making the said oath, make an affirmation in like terms.

Summoning of Executive Council

12. The Executive Council shall not be summoned except by the authority of the Governor, acting in his discretion:

Provided that the Governor shall summon the Council if five or more members of the Council so request.

Proceedings in Executive Council.

- 13.—(1) The Governor shall, so far as practicable, attend and preside at all meetings of the Executive Council, and in his absence such member as the Governor may either generally or specially appoint shall preside.
- (2) No business shall be transacted at any meeting of the Executive Council if there are less than five members of the Council present at the meeting and any member present has objected to the transaction of business on that account.
- (3) Subject to the last foregoing subsection, the Executive Council shall not be disqualified for the transaction of business by reason of any vacancy in the membership of the Council (including any vacancy not filled when the Council is first constituted or is reconstituted at any time) and the validity of the transaction of business in the Council shall not be affected by reason only of the fact that some person who was not entitled to do so took part in those proceedings.

Assignment of departments

- 14.—(1) The Governor, acting in his discretion, may by directions in writing—
 - (a) charge any ex officio member of the Executive Council with the administration of any department or subject;

Leave of absence

15. The Governor, acting in his discretion, may grant leave of absence from his duties to any member of the Executive Council.

Commencement of Part II and transitional provisions

- 16.-(1) This Part shall come into operation on such day after the appointed day as the Governor, acting in his discretion, by Proclamation published in the Gazette shall appoint(a); and thereupon the Executive Council established by the Mauritius Letters Patent, 1947 and 1954, shall cease to exist.
- (2) Whenever the Governor has occasion, before the commencement of this Part, to exercise any power conferred upon him by any other Part of this Order, then, unless the power is one which he is by this Order directed or empowered to exercise in his discretion, he shall, in the exercise of the power, consult with the said Executive Council in such circumstances, and on such conditions, as may be prescribed by such provisions as may at that time have effect, of the Instructions by such provisions as may at what time mayor effect, of the instructions issued under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet to the Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony and dated the 19th day of December, 1947, as amended by Additional Instructions dated the 22nd day of February, 1952.

PART III

Legislative Council

Legislative Council

17. There shall be a Legislative Council for the Colony which shall consist of a Speaker, three ex officio members, forty elected members and such nominated members, not exceeding twelve in number, as the Governor may, under the provisions of this Order,

The Speaker

- 18.—(1) The Speaker shall be a person who is not an ex officio, nominated, or elected member of the Legislative Council and who does not hold any public office, and shall be appointed by the Governor, acting in his discretion, by Instrument under the Public
- (2) The Speaker shall hold office during Her Majesty's pleasure and, subject thereto, for such period as may be specified in the Instrument by which he is appointed, and shall not vacate his office by reason of dissolution of the Legislative Council:

Provided that the Speaker may, by writing under his hand addressed o the Governor, resign his office.

(3) If the office of Speaker is vacant, or if the Speaker is absent from the Colony or for any other reason unable to perform the functions of his office, the Governor, acting in his discretion, may by Instrument under the Public Seal appoint a person to act as Speaker; and the provisions of this Order other than subsection (1) of this section shall apply in relation to that person as they apply in relation to the Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker

- 19.—(1) The Legislative Council shall—
- (a) at its first sitting in every session, and
- (b) at its first sitting after the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of Deputy Speaker, or as soon thereafter as may be convenient, elect as Deputy Speaker of the Legislative Council one of its own members, who is not a member of the Executive Council.

- (2) The Deputy Speaker shall, unless he earlier vacates his office under the provisions of this Order, hold office until some other person is elected as Deputy Speaker under paragraph (a) of the foregoing subsection.
 - (3) (a) A person shall vacate the office of Deputy Speaker—
 - (i) upon ceasing to be a member of the Legislative Council; or
 - (ii) upon becoming a member of the Executive Council.
- (b) The Deputy Speaker may by writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker or, in the absence of the Speaker or if there is no Speaker, to the Clerk of the Legislative Council, resign his office.
- (4) In any election of a Deputy Speaker under this section the votes of the members of the Legislative Council shall be given by ballot in such a manner as not to disclose how any particular member votes.

Ex officio members

20. The ex officio members of the Legislative Council shall be the Colonial Secretary, the Attorney-General and the Financial Secretary.

Elected members

21. The elected members of the Legislative Council shall be persons qualified for election in accordance with the provisions of this Order and elected in the manner provided by any law enacted under the Mauritius (Electoral Provisions) Order in Council, 1958, or this Order.

Nominated members

- 22.—(1) Subject to the provisions of section 24 of this Order, the nominated members of the Legislative Council shall be British subjects of the age of twenty-one years or upwards and shall be appointed by the Governor, acting in his discretion, by Instrument under the Public Seal.
- (2) The Governor shall forthwith report to Her Majesty through a Secretary of State every appointment of any person to be a nominated member of the Legislative Council.

Qualifications for elected membership

- 23. Subject to the provisions of the next following section, a person shall be qualified to be elected as a member of the Legislative Council if, and shall not be qualified to be so elected unless, he—

 - (d) if he ceases to be a British subject;
 - (e) if he becomes a party to any contract with the Government of the Colony for or on account of the public service, or if any firm in which he is a partner or any company of which he is a director or manager becomes a party to any such contract, or if he becomes a partner in a firm or a director or manager of a company which is a party to any such contract:

Provided that, if in the circumstances it appears to him to be just to do so, the Governor, acting in his discretion, may exempt any elected or nominated member from vacating his seat under the provisions of this paragraph, if such member, before becoming a party to such contract as aforesaid, or before or as soon as practicable after becoming otherwise interested in such contract (whether as a partner in a firm or as a director or manager of a company), discloses to the Governor the nature of such contract and his interest or the interest of any such firm or company therein;

- (f) if he ceases to be resident in the Colony;
- (g) if any of the circumstances arise that, if he were not a member of the Legislative Council, would cause him to be disqualified for election thereto by virtue of paragraph (a), (b), (d), (e), (g) or (h) of the last foregoing section; or
- (h) in the circumstances mentioned in the next following section.

Vacation of seat on sentence

26.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, if an elected or nominated member of the Legislative Council is sentenced by a court in any part of Her Majesty's dominions to death or to imprisonment

(by whatever name called) for a term exceeding twelve months, he council, and his seat in the Council shall become vacant at the expiration of a period of thirty days thereafter:

Provided that the Speaker (or, if the office of Speaker is vacant or he is for any reason unable to perform the functions of his office, the Deputy Speaker) may, at the request of the member, from time to time extend that period for thirty days to enable the member to pursue any appeal in respect of his conviction or sentence, so however that extenshall not be given without the approval of the Council signified by

- (2) If at any time before the member vacates his seat he is granted a free pardon or his conviction is set aside or his sentence is reduced to a term of imprisonment of less than twelve months or a punishment other than imprisonment is substituted, his seat in the Legislative Council shall not become vacant under the foregoing subsection, and he may again perform his functions as a member of the Council.
- (3) For the purpose of this section two or more terms of imprisonment that are required to be served consecutively shall be regarded as a single term of imprisonment for the aggregate period of those terms.

Determination of questions as to membership

- 27.—(1) Any question whether a person has been validly appointed as a nominated member of the Legislative Council or whether a nominated member of the Legislative Council has vacated his seat therein shall be determined by the Governor, acting in his discretion.
- (2) Any question whether a person has been validly elected as a member of the Legislative Council, or whether an elected member of the Legislative Council has vacated his seat therein, shall be determined by the Supreme Court.

Temporary members of the Legislative Council

28.—(1) Whenever an ex officio or a nominated member of the Legislative Council is unable, because of his illness or absence from the Colony, to perform his functions as a member of the Council, the Governor, acting in his discretion, may by Instrument under the Public Seal appoint a person to be temporarily a member of the

Provided that he shall appoint a person who is a public officer in place of an ex officio member, and a person qualified for appointment as a nominated member in place of a nominated member.

- (2) A person appointed under this section to be temporarily a member of the Legislative Council—
- (a) shall hold his seat in the Council during Her Majesty's pleasure;
- (b) shall vacate his seat when he is notified by the Governor that the member in whose place he was appointed is again able to perform his functions as a member of the Council, or when the seat of the member in whose place he was appointed becomes
- (3) The Governor shall forthwith report to a Secretary of State my appointment made under this section.

- (4) Subject to the provisions of this section, the provisions of this Order shall apply in relation to a person appointed to be temporarily a member of the Legislative Council—
 - (a) as they apply in relation to ex officio members, if he was appointed in place of such a member; and
 - (b) as they apply in relation to nominated members, if he was appointed in place of such a member.

Electoral districts

29.—(1) For the purpose of electing members of the Legislative Council the Colony shall be divided into forty electoral districts, each of which shall return one member.

(2) The boundaries of each electoral district shall be fixed by the Governor by Proclamation published in the Gazette.

Qualifications of electors

30. Subject to the provisions of the next following section, a person shall be entitled to be registered as an elector in one electoral district only, but he shall not be entitled to be registered as an elector unless he—

- (a) is a British subject of the age of twenty-one years or upwards and
- (b) has resided in the Colony for a period of at least two years immediately before the date of registration or is domiciled in the Colony and is resident therein at that date; and
- (c) has resided in the electoral district in which he claims to be registered for a period of at least six months immediately before the date of registration.

Disqualifications of electors

- 31. No person shall be entitled to be registered as an elector in any electoral district who—
 - (a) has been sentenced by a court in any part of Her Majesty's dominions to death or to imprisonment (by whatever name called) for a term exceeding twelve months, and has not either suffered the punishment to which he was sentenced or such other punishment as may by competent authority have been substituted therefor or received a free pardon; or
 - (b) is a person adjudged to be of unsound mind or detained as a criminal lunatic under any law in force in the Colony; or
 - (c) is disqualified for registration as an elector by any law in force in the Colony relating to offences connected with elections.

Right to vote at elections

- 32.—(1) Any person who is registered as an elector in an electoral district shall, while so registered, be entitled to vote at any election for that district unless he is prohibited from so voting by any law in force in the Colony—
 - (a) because he is a returning officer; or
 - (b) because he has been concerned in any offence connected with elections.
- (2) No person shall vote at any election for any electoral district who is not registered as an elector in that district.

Law as to elections

- 33. Subject to the provisions of this Order, a law enacted under this Order may provide for the election of members of the Legislative Council, including (without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power) the following matters, that is to say:
 - (a) the qualifications and disqualifications of electors;
 - (b) the registration of electors;
- (c) the ascertainment of the qualifications of electors and of candidates for election;
- (d) the division of the Colony into electoral districts for the purpose
- (e) the holding of elections;
- (f) the determination of any question which may arise as to whether any person has been validly elected a member of the Legislative Council or as to whether the seat of any elected member in the Legislative Council has become vacant;
- (g) the definition and trial of offences relating to elections and the imposition of penalties therefor, including disqualification for membership of the Legislative Council, or for registration as an elector, or for voting at elections, of any person concerned in any
- (h) the disqualification for election as members of the Legislative of which involve any responsibility for, or in connection with, the conduct of any election or the compilation or revision of any

Governor's reserved power

43.—(1) If the Governor considers that it is expedient in the interest of public order, public faith or good government (which expressions shall, without prejudice to their generality, include the responsibility of the Colony as a territory within the Commonwealth, and all matters pertaining to the creation or abolition of any public office or to the salary or other conditions of service of any public officer), that any (Bill introduced, or any motion proposed, in the Legislative Council should have effect, then, if the Council fail to pass such Bill or to carry such motion within such time and in such form as the Governor whinks reasonable and expedient, the Governor form as the Governor thinks reasonable and expedient, the Governor may, at any time that he thinks fit, and notwithstanding any provisions of this Order or of any Standing Orders of the Council, declare that such Bill or motion shall have effect as if it had been passed or carried by the Council either in the form in which it was so introduced or proposed or with such amendments as the Governor thinks fit that have been moved or proposed in the Council, including any committee thereof; and the Bill or the motion shall be deemed thereor the motion shan be deemed therepipon to have been so passed or carried, and the provisions of this Order, and in particular the provisions relating to assent to Bills and disallowance of laws, shall have effect accordingly.

(2) The Governor shall forthwith report to a Secretary of State every case in which he makes any such declaration and the reasons therefor.

(3) If any member of the Legislative Council objects to any declaraton made under this section, he may, within seven days of the making thereof, submit to the Governor a statement in writing of his reasons for so objecting, and a copy of such statement shall, if furnished by such member, be forwarded by the Governor as soon as practicable to a Secretary of State.

(4) Any declaration made under this section other than a declaration relating to a Bill may be revoked by a Secretary of State and the Governor shall cause notice of such revocation to be published in the Gazette; and from the date of such publication any motion that is deemed to have been carried by virtue of the declaration shall cease to have effect and the provisions of subsection (2) of section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, shall apply to such revocation as they apply to the repeal of an Act of Parliament.

(5) The powers conferred on the Governor by this section shall be exercised by him in his discretion.

Assent to Bills

- 44.—(1) A Bill shall not become a law until—
- (a) the Governor has assented to it in Her Majesty's name and on Her Majesty's behalf and has signed it in token of such assent, or
- (b) Her Majesty has given Her assent to it through a Secretary of State and the Governor has signified such assent by Proclamation published in the Gazette.
- (2) When a Bill is presented to the Governor for his assent, he shall, acting in his discretion but subject to the provisions of this Order and of any Instructions addressed to him under Her Majesty's Sign Manual and Signet or through a Secretary of State, declare that he assents, or refuses to assent, to it, or that he reserves the Bill for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure:

Provided that the Governor shall reserve for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure—

- (a) any Bill by which any provision of this Order is revoked or amended or which is in any way repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the provisions of this Order; and
- (b) any Bill which determines or regulates the privileges, immunities or powers of the Legislative Council or of its members; unless he has been authorized by a Secretary of State to assent to it.

Disallowance of laws

- 45.—(1) Any law to which the Governor has given his assent may be disallowed by Her Majesty through a Secretary of State.
- (2) Whenever such a law has been disallowed by Her Majesty the Governor shall cause notice of such disallowance to be published in the Gazette and the law shall be annulled with effect from the date of the publication of that notice.
- (3) The provisions of subsection (2) of section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, shall apply in relation to the annulment of any law under this section as they apply in relation to the repeal of an Act of Parliament, save that any enactment repealed or amended by or in pursuance of that law shall have effect as from the date of the annulment as if that law had not been made.

Oath of allegiance

- 46.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, no member of the Legislative Council shall be permitted to take part in the proceedings of the Council (other than proceedings necessary for the purposes of this section) until he has made and subscribed before the Council an oath of allegiance in the following form:—

he may think fit, to any officer in the public service any of the powers conferred on the Governor by the foregoing subsection.

- (b) The Governor shall not-
- (i) delegate any such power unless he has obtained the consent of a Secretary of State to such delegation; or
- (ii) delegate any such power with respect to officers whose annual emoluments exceed such sum as may be prescribed by a Secretary of State
- (c) For the purposes of this subsection the emoluments of an officer shall (whether or not he is employed on terms that include eligibility for pension) include only such emoluments as, under the law for the time being in force relating to pensions, are taken into account in computing pensions.
- . (3) If any law in force in the Colony immediately before the appointed day confers on any officer in the public service any power to appoint, promote, transfer, dismiss, or exercise disciplinary control over, other officers in the public service, that power shall be deemed to have been delegated to that officer by the Governor under the last foregoing subsection, and shall be exercisable by that officer until it is revoked by the Governor or until the provision conferring it has been repealed or revoked.

Public Service Commission

- 52.—(1) There shall be for the Colony a Public Service Commission (in this Part referred to as "the Commission") which shall consist of a chairman and such number of other members as may be prescribed by any law enacted in pursuance of subsection (1) of section 54 of this Order.
- (2) The chairman and other members of the Commission shall be appointed by the Governor, acting in his discretion.
- (3) The Governor, acting in his discretion, may revoke the appointment of the chairman or any other member of the Commission.
- (4) No person shall be appointed as a member of the Commission if he is a member of the Legislative Council and, if any member of the Commission becomes a member of the Legislative Council, his appointment as a member of the Commission shall thereupon be deemed to be revoked.

Public Service Commission to advise Governor

- 53.—(1) The Governor may, either generally or specially and in whatever manner he thinks fit, refer to the Commission for its advice any matter relating to the appointment of any person to an office in the public service, or the dismissal or disciplinary control of officers in the public service, or any other matter that, in his opinion, affects the public service.
- (2) It shall be the duty of the Commission to advise the Governor on any question that he refers to it under this section, but the Governor shall not be obliged to act in accordance with its advice.

PART VI

Judges

Retirement and resignation of judges

56.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part, a judge of the Supreme Court shall hold office until he attains the age of sixty-two years:

Provided that the Governor, acting in his discretion, may permit a judge to continue in office beyond the age of sixty-two years for a period which does not exceed, or for consecutive periods which do not in the aggregate exceed, three years.

- (2) A judge of the Supreme Court may at any time resign his office by writing under his hand addressed to the Governor.
- (3) No office of judge of the Supreme Court shall be abolished while there is a substantive holder of that office.

Removal of judges

- -(1) A judge of the Supreme Court may be removed from office only for inability to perform the functions of his office (whether arising from infimity of body or mind or any other cause) or for misbehaviour, and shall not be removed except in accordance with the next following subsection.
- (2) A judge of the Supreme Court shall be removed from office by the Governor by Order under the Public Seal if the question of removing him from office has, at the request of the Governor, made in pursuance of the next following subsection, been referred by Her Majesty to the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council under section 4 of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833(a), or any other enactment enabling Her Majesty in that behalf, and the Judicial Committee has advised Her Majesty that the judge ought to be removed from office for inability as aforesaid or misbehaviour.

- (3) If the Governor considers that the question of removing a judge of the Supreme Court from office for inability as aforesaid or misbehaviour ought to be investigated, then
 - (a) the Governor shall by Order under the Public Seal (which he may vary or revoke by another such Order) appoint a tribunal, which shall consist of a chairman and not less than two other members, selected by the Governor from among persons who hold or have held office as a judge of a court having unlimited jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters in some part of Her Majesty's dominions or a court having jurisdiction in appeals from any such court:
 - (b) the tribunal shall enquire into the matter and report on the facts thereof to the Governor and recommend to the Governor whether he should request that the question of removing the judge from office should be referred by Her Majesty to the Judicial Committee; and
 - (c) if the tribunal so recommends, the Governor shall request that the question should be referred accordingly.
- (4) Subject to the provisions of the last foregoing subsection, the provisions of the Commissions of Inquiry Ordinance(b), as in force on the appointed day, shall apply in relation to a tribunal appointed by an Order made under that subsection as if they were commissioners appointed by a commission issued under the Ordinance, and references in the Ordinance to commissioners and a commission shall be construed accordingly.
- (5) If the question of removing a judge of the Supreme Court from office has been referred to a tribunal under subsection (3) of this section the Governor may suspend the judge from performing the functions of his office, and any such suspension may at any time be revoked by the Governor and shall in any case cease to have effect—
 - (a) if the tribunal recommends to the Governor that he should not request that the question of removing the judge from office should be referred by Her Majesty to the Judicial Committee; or
 - (b) if the Judicial Committee advises Her Majesty that the judge ought not to be removed from office.
- (6) The powers conferred upon the Governor by this section shall be exercised by him in his discretion.
- (7) This section shall apply to any person appointed to be temporarily a judge of the Supreme Court as it applies to a substantive holder of the office of judge of the Supreme Court, but without prejudice to the provisions of section 6 of the Courts Ordinance(e), as enacted by the Courts (Amendment) Ordinance, 1954(d), or to any other provision made by any law for the time being in force in the Colony for the termination of the appointment of such a person at the end of a

The Mauritius (Constitution) (Amendment) Order in Council, 1958

At the Court at Buckingham Palace, the 19th day of December, 1958

Present,

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council

Her Majesty, in exercise of the powers enabling Her in that behalf, is pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:—

Citation, and commencement

- 1.—(1) This Order may be cited as the Mauritius (Constitution) (Amendment) Order in Council, 1958, and the Mauritius (Constitution) Order in Council, 1958(a) (hereinafter referred to as "the principal Order") and this Order may be cited together as the Mauritius (Constitution) Orders in Council, 1958.
- (2) This Order shall come into operation forthwith and shall be published in the Government Gazette of Mauritius.

Sidenote to section 2 of principal order

2. In the margin of section 2 of the principal Order the word "Interpretation" is inserted as a sidenote.

Amendment of principal Order

- 3. Subsection (2) of section 16 of the principal Order is amended by substituting for the words "February, 1952." the words "February, 1952, and the 1st day of April, 1958."
 - 4. Part V of the principal Order is amended—
 - (a) by inserting as subsection (4) of section 51:
 - "(4) The powers conferred upon the Governor by this section shall be exercised by him in his discretion."; and
 - (b) by substituting, in subsection (1) of section 53, for the words "The Governor" the words "The Governor, acting in his discretion."

W. G. Agnew.

ADDITIONAL INSTRUCTIONS passed under the Sign Manual and Signet to the Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony of Mauritius.

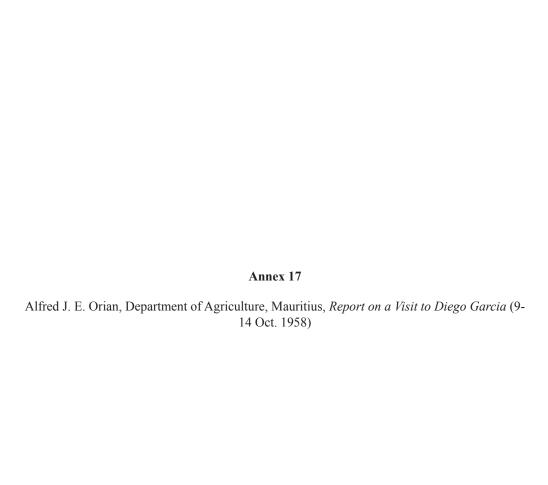

Dated 1st April, 1958.

ELIZABETH R.

ADDITIONAL INSTRUCTIONS to Our Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over Our Colony of Mauritius, or other Officer for the time being Administering the Government of Our said Colony.

Whereas We are minded further to amend the Instructions under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet dated the nineteenth day of December,

I - INTRODUCTION

VOL. 38

The writer left Mauritius per M. V. "SIR JULES" on the 1st October 1958 and reached Diego Garcia on the morning of the 9th. The "SIR JULES" left for Peros Banhos and Salomon, returning a few days later. The writer spent altogether 6 days in the island which he left on the 15th, arriving in Mauritius on the 23rd.

II - DIEGO GARCIA : SITUATION, TOPOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Diego Garcia is the southernmost atoll of the Chagos Group, which is situated between the parallels of 4°44′S. and 7°41′S. and the meridians of 70°47′E. and 72°52′E., about midway between Ceylon and Mauritius. It is the most important island of the Archipelago; its distance from Mauritius is 1,174 miles in a north-easterly direction. It is a typical atoll made up of a narrow ribbon of land varying in width from 30 yards to 1¼ mile and almost completely encircling a vast V-shaped lagoon opening to the ocean towards the north-west. Three small islands lie across the mouth of the lagoon, which is itself 13 miles long and 4 to 6 miles broad; they are known by the names of West (1), Middle and East Islands (2).

Diego Garcia covers an area of about 6,000 acres; the land is subject to alterations, being at times washed away in one part and raised at another. The whole of the land composing the atoll is very low; the highest point being only 30 feet above high tide level and the general elevation 3 to 5 feet, so that the island appears to rise just above the waves. It is surrounded by reefs—the outer or seaward shore being higher than the inner or lagoon shore. Swamps formed by the sea or back-waters are fairly extensive in places. The strong tidal currents cause considerable beach erosion.

The nature of the soil varies a great deal from place to place consisting in some localities of bare coral rock while in others it is made up of calcarcous sand and no coral. Also some parts of the land are older than others: these older parts have apparently been covered by vegetation for a considerable period for there is a thick peaty mould lying on the surface. According to Bourne, who visited the island in 1885, "the great strip of land which constitutes Diego" was formerly a series of disconnected islets which have since joined together by the accumulation of sand and coral debris between them. Deposits of guano occur here and there mixed with sand and marine shells or organic matter.

⁽²⁾ Or Isle Grand Barbe — the largest of the three; it is 800 yards long and nearly 100 yards broad.

Diego Diaz and Garcia de Noronha. When first discovered, it was already covered by a luxuriant vegetation of coconut palms, of tatamaka (Calophyllum inophyllum L.), of bois blanc (Hernandia peliata Meissn), and of gayac (Intsia bijuba O. Ktze). The whole island is now devoted to the cultivation of the coconut, but its central part "was evidently at one time a large garden for taro: Calocasia antiquorum Schott" (3) (Plate II).

Before the piercing of the Suez Canal, Diego Garcia was a coaling station for ships going to Australia from Aden and back while earlier still it was a safe shelter for 17th and 18th century privateers. It was visited in August 1914 by the famous German battleship "EMDEN". As there was no wireless in those days, the population, ignorant of the outbreak of war, allowed the ship to load its full complement of fuel and fresh food... only to learn of hostilities between Britain and Germany from a British destroyer 24 hours after the Emden had left. During the last war it was one of the bases held by the R.A.F. and R.A. in the Indian Orean.

The Archipelago lies on the southern limit of the North-west monsoon and winds at that season are from N.E. through N.W. to West. The S.E. trade wind prevails from April to October, blowing with persistence from June to September. Fortunately a natural windbreak is provided by the almost unbroken zone of Scavola frutescens Krause (Bois manioc), Thespesia populnea Soland, and of Tournefortia argentea, L. (Veloutier). Calms are very rare and cyclones do not occur. The climate is typically equatorial; the temperature varies little throughout the year and rarely exceeds 32°C or falls below 22°C. The weather is coolest when the S.E. Trade Wind is at its strongest. The dry season lasts from June to September and the wet season from October to March. The rainfall is high with fairly great variations. In 1957 it was 128 inches and this year (September 1957 — August, 1958) it dropped to 88.5 inches.

High rainfall and temperature, absence of cyclones and a constant supply of soil water can easily explain the dense vegetation which is to be found everywhere except where the soil conditions constitute a limiting factor. These conditions are responsible for the absence of a distinct flowering season and for the gigantic size of many native and cultivated trees (Wiehe 1939). The atoll is covered with luxuriant vegetation of bright green colour and is fringed by pure white sandy beaches. In places the tree-line is 125 feet high, while clumps of Casuarina equisetifolia Forst., reach 80 feet or more.

III - THE COCONUT PLANTATIONS AND THE COCONUT INDUSTRY

The main industry of the island is the production of copra; this is exported to Mauritius where oil is extracted and the press-cake or poonac is valuable when added to poultry feed mixtures. Some guano is also exported. Table I summarises the island's production.

1957	4,817,000	590	34 tons	In addition 16,000 nuts were used in seedling production
1958	4,514,000	558	36 ,,	This is equivalent to 26,520 bottles of oil

This year's guano production amounted to 1,425 tons. In addition 800 tons are in stock at Diego.

NATURAL AND ARTIFICIAL GROVES

The coconut groves are nearly all natural plantations which are very old; as a result yields are going down. In places the palms are intermingled with trees and other dense undergrowth on which grow epiphytic ferns, such as Asplenium nidus L. (an edible species commonly called "langue de vache"), while at their base and on the ground arthick tufts of Psilotum triquetrum Sw. thus forming an inextricable jungle. Owing to the dense foliage and the very low light intensity resulting therefrom, the palms are sometimes bent, with spirally twisted trunks.

A tremendous effort in replanting has been made in the past few years and regular plantations of the palm are now to be found e.g. at Nordest, East Point and Carcasse.

In striking contrast with the compact undergrowth of the natural groves, the vegetation of artificial groves changes to creeping plants associated with noxious weeds such as Tridax procumbens L. (Herbe caille), Fimbrystilis spathacea Rath. (Herbe malgache), Bryophyllum pinnatum Kurze (Soudefafe), Stachytarpheta indica Vahl (Quene de rat), Achyrantes aspera L. (Herbe sergent), Stenotaphrum dimidiatum (4) Bronqn. (Chiendent bourrique), Bidens pilosa L. (Villebague), Ageratum conyzoides L. (Herbe bouc), Boerharria diffusa L. (Liane nina), Portulaca oleracea L. (Purslane, pourpier), Passiflora suberosa L. (Liane poc-poc) and the ubiquitous shrub Morinda citrifolia L. (Bois tortue). Plants making up the beach community are frequently parasitized by Cassytha tiliformis L. (Liane sans fin).

A large number of nuts are lost through germination. In the past, planting was only carried out to replace dead trees, and small holes were made in which self-sown seedlings removed with a hoe were planted hence the name "coco-pioche"). This practice has disappeared altogether and large holes are now dug (3—7' diameter and from 4-10' deep according to the water table) and the hard pan underlying the surface is horoughly broken. The establishment of seedlings is therefore not as slow as before and better trees result. Selection of seedlings, however, is not effected in nurseries. Nor is manuring of established plantations ractised. It might be advantageous to use some of the lower grade guano o improve the soil in deficient areas. The only manuring is at planting time in the hole dug which is filled with organic matter and ash from burnt coir and coconut leaves.

Weeding is an important problem and is done by hand: gangs of abourers simply cutting down and burning the undergrowth from which some charcoal is made at the same time. Weed-killers are not used; hould such be employed great care should be exercised to prevent injury of the coconut trees. A flame thrower might perhaps be used where Bryophyllum (soudcfafe) is plentiful.

Ripe nuts are allowed to fall on the ground; these are collected weekly and the husks removed. Formerly the husks instead of being burnt were stacked round the trunks of the palms up to a height of 3-4 feet. Phis practice favoured the development of the rhinoceros heetle and also if adventitions roots along the trunk (Plate IV). The de-husked nuts are ransported in donkey-drawn carts and the meat is dried in the coparatilns at East Point. Formerly the kernels were broken and the meat then pread on drying platforms with sliding corrugated iron roofs. Sun lrying has sometimes to be resorted to, but it is altogether an unsatisactory operation for should rain occur the wet copra does not keep and ecomes rancid and mouldy. It is also more readily attacked by the copra ecelle (Necrobia ruffpes Deg.) (5) than kiln-dried copra.

Owing to the small size of the nuts, about 8,000 to 8,500 nuts are equired for 1 ton of copra.

INSECT ENEMIES OF THE COCONUT PALM

About 800 insects have been recorded throughout the world on the occount palm. Of these, nearly 25% are specific to the genus Cocos. Only bout half a dozen have so far gained access to Diego. Top of the list omes the rhinoceros beetle.

The following is a list of coconut pests in Diego:-

TABLE II

Pests	Insect Order	Notes
(1) Orycles rhinoceros L.	Coleoptera : Scarabaeidae	Commonly called the rhi- noceros beetle
(2) Aspidiotus destructor Sign.	Hemiptera: Coccoidea-Dias- pidae	The coconut scale
(3) Chrysomphalus ficus Ashm.	do	A round flat scale
(4) Pseudococcus adoni- dum I	Hemiptera: Pseudo cocci- dae	A white fluffy mealy bug
(5) Pseudococcus sp.	— do —	— do —

Aspidiotus destructor Sign.

This is the widespread coconut scale. It is a Diaspine coccid which also attacks a wide range of plants, including the bunana, mango, papaw, avocado, breadfruit and Barringtonia sp. (Bonnet de prêtre). This leaf pest is covered by a flat delicate waxy and semi-transparent scale. The male scales have an oval outline, the female scales are circular. The eggs hatch under the scale and the larvae crawl out slowly in search of a suitable place to fix themselves by inserting their rostra into the leaf. The spread takes place in a number of ways: human agency (coconut leaf baskets), insects, birds and wind. Chilocorus nigritus F., a coccinellid beetle or lady bird introduced earlier from Mauritius was recovered but was present in insufficient numbers to check the scale. Thus, at Nordest a number of young coconut palms were severely attacked. The young fronds showed pronounced yellow and brown dying leaflets. The scales were so numerous as to form a continuous light brown crust on the undersurface of the entire fronds. There are indications that a few palms have been killed by this scale and not by the rhinoceros beetle.

It is suggested that new importations of C. nigritus be made from Mauritius. Another coccinellid Cryptognatha nodiceps Muls. present in Trinidad and Fiji could also be tried as its introduction into the latter islands was very successful against Aspidiotus.

It may be mentioned that the following ladybirds also prey upon Aspidiotus: — Scymnus oblongosignatus Muls., Scymnus sp. Scymnomor-phus sp., Lindorus lophanthae Blaisd., Exochomus lacviusculus Wsc., Chilochorus politus Muls. As these occur in Mauritius, it is also suggested that one or more of these insects be introduced into Diego for trial. An alternative control measure on small palms is to use a 0.2% malathion solution followed by an application of parathion, but as these substances are organophosphorus chemicals, they can only be used under expert guidance.

Chrysomphalus ficus Ashm. is another Diaspine coccid present in Diego Garcia. It is a round flat scale which can be controlled by coccinellids or by chemical treatment.

Pseudococcus spp.

These mealy bugs are common everywhere and are tended by ants; more commonly by Technomyrmex detorquens Wik. The ants intensify the attacks by carrying the young stages from leaf to leaf and palm to palm and warding off parasitic and predaceous insects. To keep the ants off, monthly sprayings with 0.5% chlordane might be made, when no other treatment of the palms is necessary.

Acarine

In a number of cases the palms showed signs of attack apparently by a mite; but in spite of repeated searches, the mite Raoiclla indica Hirst was not encountered during the author's inspections of the groves. This does not rule out its presence in the island and investigations at other periods of the year would be necessary to find out whether it is present or not.

DISEASES OF THE COCONUT PALM

The author ventures to make the following remarks on some diseaes of the coconut palm which he observed during his visit: Bud rot, Stem rot and Stem bleeding disease, Yellowing, Leaf spot, Quick tapering and Premature nutfall.

Bud-rot — This disease fortunately is not very common. A few ases were seen at East Point, at Cimetière "Zenfan", and at Noroit. The attacked trees which are growing on unsuitable soil, seem also to ave been adversely affected by strong winds. The only control measure dvocated if the disease develops in epidemic proportion is burning down I affected trees.

Stem-rot and Stem bleeding — This occurs throughout the island. he symptoms are fairly easy to detect and are characterized by the foration of drops of brown ooze from the bark which is cracked in a numer of places, and of reddish-brown or dark streaks along the stem. The athogen is a fungus Ceratostomella paradoza (de Seynes) Dade. In Ivanced cases of the disease, large cavities appear inside the stem.

(Plate IV, trunk above abnormal roots). More than a score of heavily affected trees were counted in different places. Although the vigour of the palms is obviously impaired as a result of this disease, crops of nuts were present in all cases encountered.

The diseases known as "knife-cut" and "little leaf" were not seen although in one case large gashes were found on a palm, but it was difficult to decide whether the effects were due to human agency or to natural causes.

Yellowing — Pronounced leaf yellowing is common at a number of places. Sometimes it is restricted to occasional trees, at other times a fairly large area is affected, as for example at Carcasse, Verger, Canoterie, Aux puits. As pointed out already the mite Raoiella was not encountered in the island; the yellowing might be of pathological nature or be due to some unfavourable soil condition. A soil survey or possibly a study of soil profiles only might throw light on the problem.

Leaf spot caused by Pestalozzia palmarum Cke. is of extremely frequent occurrence resulting sometimes in a severe blight on young seedlings.

Tapering stem wilt or pencil point disease—In some areas the palms are apparently affected by a disease which involves rapid shrinkage in diameter, barrenness and yellowing of the tips. In advanced cases the decrease in leaf area and in stem diameter is such that the crown fails to produce leaves and dies (Plate V).

Premature nutfall — The fall of immature nuts (button nuts) within 2 months of the emergence of the spadix is a normal phenomenon. At a later stage when the endosperm of the fruit is just being formed nutfall must be attributed to insect attack or to some other adverse factor. It is known that attacks of the bug Amblypella cocophaga China in some countries (e.g. British Solomon Islands Protectorate) leads to premature fruit fall, but as neither this insect nor any allied form was encountered, the cause of the trouble must be looked for elsewhere. In any case large losses of potential crop result and the problem deserves closer attention as in some areas a considerable number of trees are non-bearing.

Lightning injury

A number of trees were found with the dead leaves still attached to the crown; as their death could not be attributed to commonly occurring causes, it is possible that they had been struck by lightning. These trees decay rapidly and serve as breeding ground for the rhinoceros beetle.

The Rat Problem

The rat problem at Diego is comparable in magnitude to the ravages of the rhinoceros beetle. According to observations and calculations an increase of more than $\frac{1}{4}$ of the nuts collected could be obtained were it not for destruction by rats.

An abstract from Charles Regnaud's book on the coconut (6) concerning damage to coconuts by rats is worth quoting as it explains the nature of the injury caused by this pest:—

« Il y a 240 ans que Pyrard écrivait: « Les rats ne s'attaquent qu'à ceux qui sont encore verts (les fruits), à cause que les secs sont trop durs à ronger, point que ces animaux désirent principalement d'en boire l'eau et ont cette industrie de faire un trou par dessus, de peur que l'eau ne se répande, et font ce trou de leur même grosseur, afin qu'ils puissent entrer dedans pour boire et manger; et quand ce fruit n'a plus de substance dedans, il s'empire et tombe de telle sorte qu'aux iles non peuplées la terre en est couverte......

Ces petits quadrupèdes n'ont pas changé de mœurs, depuis l'époque où Pyrard a signalé leurs dévastations. Ils pullulent encore dans toutes les îles où sont répandus les cocotiers... Le plus souvent, les rats entament le coco tout autour du point où il adhère à son calice persistant, en cet endroit le fruit est très tendre: aussi ont-ils bientôt atteint la noix, qui n'a pas encore atteint la dureté qu'elle doit offrir plus tard et fait leurs délices de la crème et de l'eau qu'elle contient. Chose assex singulière, les rats s'attaquent indifféremment aux cocos encore très jeunes, ou à ceux qui ont déjà acquis toute leur grosseur : ils creusent même ceux qui ne sont pas plus gros qu'un œuf d'oie......

Dans quelques-unes des îles de la mer de l'Inde. qui sont sous la dépendance de Maurice on a introduit des chats, espérant ainsi détruire ou du moins diminuer le nombre des rats: mais on n'a pas tardé à s'apercevoir que les chats dévoraient exclusivement les jeunes oiseaux de mer qui leur offraient une pâture plus délicate et infiniment plus facile à se procurer. On à souvent recours, dans ces mêmes îles, à un moyen analogue a celui employé dans certaines parties de la France pour la destruction des taupes. On a des chercheurs de rats: ce sont des noirs qui, en outre de la paye mensuelle, reçoivent la gratification d'un verre de rhum par douzaine de queues de rats qu'ils rapportent à l'établissement; mais ce moyen est encore insuffisant »...

Besides cats, dogs were introduced in Diego to destroy the rats; the attempt was not a success, as the dogs were not of the right type and they are now but degenerate mongrels which constitute a nuisance and should, in their turn, be exterminated. Introduction of the mongoose must be ruled out for obvious reasons. Trapping is not very efficient as only about 600 rats were destroyed by that means from September 1957 to August 1958. Reference is here made to an article (7) by J. R. Williams, former Entomologist of the Department of Agriculture on rat control and it is recommended that those interested in the problem in Diego should read the article.

Poison should be used with great caution, because after eating certain toxic substances, rats run for water and in Diego drinking water is in many cases obtained from wells. Substances containing warfarin, which give good results when properly used, should in the author's opinion be the type of poison to try.

Metal shields or strips of tin, something like an open small umbrella might be nailed round the palms in such a fashion that the lower rim stands out from the trunk, thus preventing ascent. This, however, is a costly job for in saline air metal corrosion is rapid and owing to increase in girth of the trees the shields burst.

BIOLOGICAL ASSOCIATIONS

A word might here be introduced about the origin of the coconut palm. Botanists generally accept O. F. Cook's views about the American origin of the coconut palm (1901), but this seems inadmissible for the crab Birgus latro Hbst. does not occur in American coasts and it is improbable that such an organism could have been evolved independently of the coconut.

At the time of my visit this crab (commonly called the Robber Crab or the "Cipaye") seemed very scarce. According to the Manager it does not at the moment cause important losses.

On the other hand, the large red crab, Cardisoma carnifex Hbst. (commonly called "troulourou") causes severe depredations in vegetable gardens; further they seriously damage the only road which crosses the island. They could be controlled by pesticide treatment.

IV - THE RHINOCEROS BEETLE

Before discussing methods for the control of Oryctes rhinoceros L., it is necessary to review briefly its life cycle and its effects upon the growth of the coconut palm. It is an Asiatic beetle which probably gained access to Diego Garcia during World War I, "being already firmly established in 1939 in some localities" (Wiehe). It now menaces the entire production of copra and consequently of poonac.

Notes on the life-cycle

The length of the life cycle of the insect from egg to adult has been variously assessed. Ghosh (1911) regarded it as being 336 days. Corbett (1932) found the minimum time, under laboratory conditions, to be just under four months and the maximum just over 9½ months, while other writers have found it to be 2 years. Obviously it varies with temperature and humidity. The adults occur throughout the year, but are more abundant from January to May. They lie in concealment during lay-time and begin their flight at dusk, when they attack the coconut alm and burrow into its heart. Sometimes they simply bite through the olded leaf so that when it unfolds later, the leaflets are found perforated or cut symmetrically off. At other times they bite right through to the growing point and the tree is doomed.

The adult has been found to live for just under 3½ months under aboratory conditions. The female starts laying about one month after mergence and the total number of eggs varies between 27 and 60. They are placed singly, or a few at a time, in decaying palm stems or humusaden rubbish heaps. The eggs average 3.5 mm by 2 mm (Plate I); they are creamy white in colour and increase considerably in size before atching; they are often surrounded with hardened earth.

In Diego, under fairly humid conditions they hatch in about 8 lays. The newly-hatched larva or grub measures 5-6 mm in length (Plate). As many as 40 to 100 larvae have been counted in a few feet of cocount stem. Dead trees are soon converted into a damp brown powdery nass, and it has been calculated that over a thousand beetles can be red from a rotten coconut tree before it is quite destroyed.

The grub lies on its side; it is fleshy and translucent and has three tages of development; when full grown it measures 70 mm x 25 mm. It as a large brown head with powerful black mandibles. The body is overed with numerous reddish bristles and reddish brown spiracles ccur along its sides; the anal segment is very swollen. Larval life aveages four months. The grub finally enters the pupal stage which is of hort duration, so that pupae are comparatively rare to find. The pupa at first white but later turns brown. The size varies, but is generally bout 48 mm by 20 mm. The sex is indicated by the size of the horn on the head which as in the adult is prominent in the male. The adult beetle very hard and chitinous almost shining black above and reddish brown slow and measuring from 50 to 65 mm by 20 to 35 mm. When it merges from the pupa, it is yellowish to brown in colour; the thorax is otched and scooped out in front toward the head. The elytra are smooth ith longitudinal grooves and fine punctures. The legs are stout, spiny ad adapted for digging.

ampaign of eradication

Prior to 1951, the Entomology Division of the Department of griculture supplied Diego Ltd. with several colonies of Scolia oryctolaga Coq. for release in the atoll, apparently without result. In November of the same year, N. L. H. Krauss, who was collecting Scolia ruficornis F. in Zanzibar for despatch to American possessions in the Pacific, kindly sent two consignments of the wasp (Plate I) to Mauritius for forwarding to Diego Garcia. The following table summarizes the position in December, 1951.

Table III - Shipment of S, ruficornis F, from Zanzibar to Diego Garcia

Shipment	Date sent	No. sent	Date of Manritius			Date sent from Mauritius	No. sent from Mauritius to Diego
No. Zanzibar	Zanzibar	Mauritius	Alive	Dead
1	19.11.51	60 9 P	22.11.51	55 ♀ ♀ 8 ♂ ♂	5 ♀ ♀ 2 ♂ ♂	7.1.51	36 ₹ ₹
2	29.11.51	64 P p 6 d d	3.12.51	5699 6でで	8 2 Q	7.12.51	53♀♀6♂♂

The total shipped to Diego was thus 89 ? ? and 6 d d. The wasps became established and were recovered in 1956. The writer this year collected about a hundred wasps at East Point and Paille Sec. In spite of these recoveries, it is evident that the control of Orycles rhimoeros (L) through scolid wasps has not yet proved its effectiveness and that infestation remains chronic throughout the island. The Manager of the island tation remains chronic throughout the island. The standard of the island seeing that the percentage paratism is negligible started a campaign of collection and destruction of the eggs, larvae and adult bectles (8). The total catch during the past year (September 1957 to August 1958) has been 691,657. During my short stay in Diego Garcia the catch consisted of 40 eggs, 854 larvae, 34 pupae and 51 adults (2733 and 24??). Not one of these larvae was parasitized.

Suggestions for dealing with the beetle

The problem of rhinoceros beetle control is now complicated by the fact that nut production is falling, this being due to the old age of the trees. Although an intensive programme of replanting has been start-

⁽⁸⁾ The usual method of destruction of the adult is to employ labourers (especially women) provided with a long flexible iron wire terminated by a barb with which to spear the beetle in its burrow at the base of the leaf stalks. (Incidentally this method is also employed in India where a wheetle rod s, i.e. an iron rod 2 1/2 feet x 3/8" with a hook at one end and another end bent form a ring for a handle, is used.— Ref. Clerian, M. C. & Anatanarrayanan, K. P., Indian J. Agric. Sci. 1939. 9: 571-599). Attacks can easily be seen because of the pre ence of « dead hearts » or central fronds killed by the beetle.

Countings of all stages of the beetle are then made and payment is 3 eggs, larvae or adults for one cent. Another method is to attract the adults by small fires at night and beat them into the fire while larvae are destroyed in trap logs. The author finds the economic value of the methods of collection uncertain.

ed, out of 16,000 seedlings planted last year, already a third have died through attacks of the beetle which is now, and has been for the past few years, a pest of considerable importance in the island. The writer therefore feels that a new approach to its control should be made:

- 10. The use of insecticides should be introduced to ensure the protection of palms in their first years of life.
- Improved methods of destruction of the larvae should be en-forced together with insecticidal treatment of compost pits and refuse heaps.
- 30. New parasites should be sent to Diego Garcia, for biological control has one great advantage: its effects are usually permanent and once achieved it requires no further attention.

Insecticidal control

Treatment of crown of young palms: B. A. O'Counor after seeing a report of the Indian Central Coconut Committee (9) and experimenting a report of the Indian Central Coconut Committee (9) and experimenting with BHC - sawdust mixtures in Fiji recommends the following:

"Placing a mixture of one part by volume of a BHC formulation in nine parts of damp saw dust in the axils of the youngest four or five fronds of every palm (10). The two formulations which have been commonly used are the dispersible powders containing 6.5% and 10% gamma isomer respectively." A wettable powder containing 32% diazinon mixed with sawdust is more effective but unfortunately more expensive (11). I am also informed that 2% dieldrin granules applied around the base of the growing tips of young coconut palms seems likely to prevent damage.

Treatment of compost heaps, dung, etc — Intensive breeding having been observed in dung heaps, it is imperative to treat these with Agro-cide 26, a new gammexane formulation now just available on the local market.

Treatment of beetle holes — As already stated adult beetles are usually speared or harpooned inside their holes at the base of the leaf stalks. It is essential that the holes in the palms be plugged with the mixture recommended above for crown treatment as other beetles have been observed to enter old holes on a number of occasions. It might also be useful to add a compatible fungicide to the mixture for in a number of cases a rot follows attacks of the beetle.

The use of trap logs.

After having seen the labourers search for grubs in trap logs, the author is of opinion that the procedure is fraught with the greatest danger. Instead of being traps, dead coconut trunks simply constitute infestation foci in the plantations. Scrupulous sanitation of the plantations should therefore be immediately resorted to and dead coconut at the plantation of the plantations. particulars should be removed and burned at the earliest possible opportunity. Indeed not even a single husk should be left in the groves. Unless this be done and unless the recommendations made above be given effect to, the chances of eradication of Orycles rhinoceros L. would be remote.

Biological control

Predatory beetles of the families Histeridae Hololepta (Leionata) Predatory beetles of the families Histeridae Hololepta (Leionata) and Elateridae (Photophorus jansoni and Pyrophorus spp.) could perhaps be obtained from New Zealand and Trinidad for introduction into Diego. The large carabid Mecoderma spinifer Broun and the huge Reduviid buy Platymeris rhadamanthus Gerst, which are respectively reported to attack the grub and adult beetle of Orycles, could possibly help in the control of the rhinoceros beetle.

V - OTHER PROBLEMS

The vegetable garden — The island suffers from a great shortage of vegetables. Maize and sweet potato are grown on a small scale, but the former is parasitized by Striga asiatica O. Kuntze. and by a rust. The variety of sweet potato is not very palatable. The sphingid moth Herse convolvati L., although present, is a minor pest of the plant.

Fruit trees — These are extremely scarce in Diego. At East Point, however, mango, jamalac, bread fruit, hog plum, jackfruit, bilimbi, papaw, seem to thrive well. Citrus plants apparently suffer from deficiency diseases. A few scale insects were also found. The insects could be controlled with insecticides.

Pesticides are not used against vegetable and fruit pests. In view of this, it is suggested that one of the employees of the Company should follow certain selected lectures in Pathology and Entomology at the College of Agriculture. Perhaps employees taking their leave could be given an extra 6 months for such training.

Improvement of soil — Considerable benefit should be derived from a visit to the island by a qualified soil chemist.

Flies and Mosquitoes — Owing to the high temperature and humidity, flies and mosquitoes breed in enormous numbers. The effect numbers, the energy of countless bites from mosquitoes must be very depressing. It was noted that in addition to wells, coconuts eaten by rats and invariably containing rain water, bred legions of larvae. To check mosquitoes, disused wells should be sprayed with D. D. T. at regular intervals. Where practicable, fallen nuts should be burnt. Reduction of the fly population by the use of malathion could also be tried.

VI - SUMMARY

Nut production in the atoll of Diego Garcia is falling. This is caused by a number of factors: the groves are old and need replanting; rats also destroy about a quarter of the crop; but the greatest damage is caused by the rhinoceros beetle, Orgetes rhinoceros L., which kills about 1/3 of the seedlings being replanted. Insecticidal treatment is recommended to prevent damage to the young palms; improved sanitation of the groves would probably reduce larval population to a very low level.

VII - ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The writer wishes to record his thanks to Mr. G. Lanier, the Manager of Diego Garcia and to his staff for the kindness shown to him during his stay in the island and for their assistance in supplying some of the data presented in this report. It is his pleasant duty also to tender sincere thanks to Mr. J. Lamusse, Secretary of Diego Ltd., and to Captain d'Argent of the M. V. "Sir Jules" who spared no effort to make his visit an agreeable one.

LES PLÉBISCITES ORGANISÉS PAR LES NATIONS UNIES

MARCEL MERLE

Le droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes a été inscrit, en 1945, parmi les buts fondamentaux que l'Organisation des Nations Unies se proposait d'atteindre. On ne saurait pourtant affirmer que le comportement des Etats membres se soit toujours inspiré de cet idéal. Alors que le règlement des litiges territoriaux consécutifs aux traités de paix de 1919 avait donné lieu à de nombreux plébiscites souvent placés sous les auspices de la Société des Nations (1), les changements de frontières intervenus depuis 1945 n'ont été, en règle générale, ni précédés ni suivis par la consultation des populations intéressées. Certes, la pratique du plébiscite ou du referendum (2) n'a pas été complètement abandonnée. La France a organisé, en 1947, un plébiscite dans les communes de Tende et de La Brigue cédées par l'Italie en vertu du traité de paix de 1947; elle a accepté un referendum pour trancher le sort de la Sarre, en 1955. A ces exemples, on peut ajouter celui du referendum constituant du 28 septembre 1958 qui a permis aux territoires d'outre-mer rattachés à la France, d'opter individuellement entre l'appartenance à la Communauté et l'indépendance. Mais ce ne sont là que des exemples isolés par rapport aux nombreuses circonstances dans lesquelles le sort de populations a été décidé impérativement par des tiers ou par des gouvernements non régulièrement mandatés à cet effet.

En face de ce déclin du droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes dans la pratique des Etats, il est à première vue remarquable de constater que l'Organisation des Nations Unies a eu plusieurs fois recours à la solution du plébiscite pour fixer le sort de certains territoires. Quatre plébiscites ont été organisés par les Nations Unies. Le premier a eu lieu au Togo sous administration britannique le 7 novembre 1959; le second dans la partie septentrionale du Cameroun sous administration britannique le 7 novembre 1959; le troisième dans les deux parties du Cameroun sous administration britannique les 11-12 février 1961; enfin, un plébiscite a été organisé le 9 mai 1961 dans le Samoa occidental placé sous l'administration de la Nouvelle-Zélande. A ces quatre exemples, il convient de rattacher, pour des raisons qui seront exposées plus loin, le contrôle exercé par les Nations Unies sur les élections législatives qui ont eu lieu le 27 avril 1958 au Togo sous administration française, ainsi que le contrôle des élections générales et du referendum qui ont eu lieu en septembre 1961 au Ruanda-Urundi sous administration belge.

Dans ces différentes circonstances, l'intervention des Nations Unies a permis d'obtenir une consultation dont les résultats, sauf dans un cas, n'ont pu être contestés; les vœux exprimés par les populations intéressées ont servi de base à l'Assemblée générale de l'O.N.U. pour déterminer le statut juridique ou territorial de ces collectivités; quant au seul cas dans lequel la solution adoptée à la suite de la consultation populaire a été contestée, le grief essentiel est tiré du comportement de la puissance administrante avant le plébiscite, des conditions mêmes dans lesquelles elle a appliqué les principes posés par l'Assemblée générale et, au fond, du degré d'aptitude de la population à se prononcer en connaissance de cause.

Le succès obtenu dans les autres expériences, en dépit de la complexité des intérêts en présence et des contestations qui les ont généralement précédées, mérite de retenir l'attention. Il faut cependant relever que si l'O.N.U. a pu faire appliquer et respecter le droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes, c'est parce que son action s'est déroulée dans un contexte particulièrement favorable : les territoires intéressés étaient placés sous le régime de tutelle, c'est-à-dire que leur sort dépendait étroitement des décisions prises par l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies. Il était donc facile à cette dernière de décider le recours au plébiscite et de fixer, souverainement, l'objet et les modalités de la consultation ainsi que d'interpréter les résultats du vote. D'autre part, la présence, sur le territoire où le plébiscite devait avoir lieu, d'autorités locales dépendant, plus ou moins directement, de la puissance administrante était de nature à favoriser considérablement la tâche des Nations Unies qui allaient pouvoir limiter leur intervention sur le terrain à des opérations de consultation et de contrôle. Le succès de toute la procédure semble donc étroitement conditionné par l'existence du régime de tutelle qui, pour être l'enjeu de ces différents plébiscites, n'en a pas moins fourni à l'organisation internationale le fondement juridique et les moyens matériels de son intervention. C'est ce que montre l'examen des phases successives de l'action des Nations Unies dans le déclenchement, le déroulement et l'interprétation du plébiscite.

LE DÉCLENCHEMENT DU PLÉBISCITE

Le chapitre XII de la Charte des Nations Unies ne contient aucune disposition particulière concernant la levée de la tutelle. Ce problème délicat peut cependant être résolu par référence à deux dispositions générales. L'article 76 précise que les fins du régime de tutelle sont les suivantes:

b) ... « favoriser également leur évolution (des territoires) progressive vers la capacité à s'administrer eux-mêmes ou l'indépendance compte tenu des conditions particulières à chaque territoire et à ses populations, des aspirations librement exprimées des populations intéressées et des dispositions qui pourront être prévues dans chaque accord de tutelle. » De ce texte il ressort 1) que le régime de tutelle a un caractère provisoire et qu'il doit tendre à la réalisation de l'indépendance, 2) que les populations intéressées doivent être consultées préalablement à la levée de la tutelle, 3) que l'autonomie ou l'indépendance ne pourront être accordées à chaque territoire qu'en fonction de ses « conditions particulières » — ce qui suppose l'appréciation individuelle et discrétionnaire du stade d'évolution et de maturité justifiant la levée éventuelle de la tutelle (réserve faite du cas où le terme du régime de tutelle a été fixé d'avance, comme cela s'est produit pour la Somalie).

L'article 85 déclare par ailleurs :

On peut considérer qu'en l'absence de toute disposition expresse en sens contraire la compétence de l'Assemblée générale s'étend, a fortiori, à l'hypothèse de la levée de la tutelle.

De la combinaison des articles 76 et 85 de la Charte, il ressort donc que l'Assemblée générale a qualité pour 1) apprécier si le degré d'évolution atteint par le territoire justifie ou non la levée de la tutelle, 2) consulter les populations intéressées sur leurs préférences.

Le fondement juridique de l'intervention des Nations Unies est donc incontestable et c'est bien à l'Assemblée générale qu'il appartient d'exercer les prérogatives attribuées par la Charte à l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Certes, l'Assemblée n'intervient pas seule. Elle est, en ce domaine comme en tout ce qui touche le régime de tutelle, assistée par le Conseil de tutelle. Ce dernier ne s'est pas contenté d'un rôle secondaire. Les missions de visite qu'il a envoyées dans les différents territoires ont étudié sur place le degré de maturité des populations et formulé des avis très précis et fortement motivés sur l'opportunité ainsi que sur les conditions juridiques et matérielles de la consultation envisagée. D'autre part, les puissances administrantes ne sont pas demeurées inactives: ce sont elles, dans le cas du Togo et du Cameroun, qui ont soulevé le problème de la cessation du régime de tutelle. La Grande-Bretagne a invoqué un argument irréfutable: le Togo et le Cameroun placés sous sa responsabilité étaient administrés, conformément aux termes mêmes des accords de tutelle, comme partie intégrante de la Côte de l'Or et de la Nigéria. L'indépendance de ces deux colonies de la Couronne devait forcément remettre en question le mode d'administration des territoires sous tutelle qui leur étaient associés, sinon même le maintien de la tutelle. Au-delà de ces arguments d'ordre juridique, il semble d'ailleurs que les puissances administrantes aient été désireuses de se décharger de la lourde responsabilité que constituait pour elles l'administration des territoires sous tutelle.

Initiatives individuelles, enquêtes approfondies ont donc précédé, dans chaque cas, l'intervention de l'Assemblée générale. C'est cependant elle qui a statué en dernier ressort, sans toujours tenir compte des avis qui lui avaient été communiqués. La responsabilité assumée en la matière par l'Assemblée générale apparaît considérable. Elle concerne: 1) l'opportunité de l'organisation du plébiscite, 2) la nature de la consultation envisagée, 3) les modalités de la consultation.

1) L'opportunité de l'organisation du plébiscite.

La question ne se poserait pas si l'O.N.U. avait fait automatiquement procéder à un plébiscite dans tous les cas de levée de tutelle. Or, l'Assemblée générale n'a exigé aucun plébiscite préalablement à la levée de la tutelle sur la partie du Cameroun confiée à l'administration de la France ni sur le Tanganyika sous administration britannique.

L'explication de cette différence de traitement ne peut pas être trouvée dans l'identité de situation des territoires où un plébiscite a été organisé: dans deux cas (Togo et Cameroun britanniques) le problème à résoudre était l'option entre le maintien de la tutelle ou le rattachement à un territoire voisin sur le point d'accéder à l'indépendance; mais dans les deux autres cas (Togo français et Samoa occidental), l'option proposée était identique à celle qui aurait pu être proposée aux habitants du Cameroun français; indépendance pure et simple ou maintien de la tutelle.

La confrontation entre ces différentes situations permet de rendre compte de la jurisprudence de l'Assemblée générale. Celle-ci décide de procéder à un plébiscite en fonction de deux considérations différentes.

a) Il y a d'abord lieu à un plébiscite si le statut envisagé pour le territoire comporte une solution autre que l'indépendance pure et simple. Tel était le cas pour le Togo britannique à qui l'on voulait donner à choisir entre le maintien de la tutelle et le rattachement à la Côte de l'Or indépendante, et pour le Cameroun britannique au sujet duquel on a envisagé successivement l'option entre le maintien de la tutelle et le rattachement au Nigéria (plébiscite au Cameroun septentrional en date du 7 novembre 1959) puis l'option entre le rattachement au Nigéria ou à la République indépendante du Cameroun (plébiscites dans les deux parties du Cameroun les 11 et 12 février 1961). L'importance de l'enjeu paraît à cet égard une justification suffisante du plébiscite. Les populations ne peuvent être affectées d'office à telle ou telle collectivité étatique. La consultation préalable doit leur permettre de fixer librement leur destin en tant que collectivité nationale.

b) Mais il y a également lieu à plébiscite dans le cas où les populations n'ont pas été en mesure de se prononcer librement sur leur sort — même si la question du rattachement à un autre Etat ne se pose pas et même si les autorités en cause (dirigeants locaux et puissance administrante) sont d'accord pour demander la levée de la tutelle. Le critère adopté est ici purement formel et se ramène à l'exigence d'une consultation libre au suffrage universel des adultes.

La solution est particulièrement nette dans le cas du Samoa occidental. La puissance administrante (Nouvelle-Zélande) et les dirigeants samoans étaient d'accord pour l'accès du territoire à l'indépendance; mais la population locale n'avait jamais été consultée au suffrage universel ni par voie électorale ni par referendum ou plébiscite. Avant d'accorder la levée de la tutelle, l'Assemblée générale a estimé nécessaire d'organiser sous son contrôle un plébiscite au Samoa occidental.

De cette situation il convient de rapprocher celle du Togo sous administration française. Il n'y a pas eu, à proprement parler, de « plébiscite » dans cette partie du Togo. Mais l'Assemblée générale a été amenée à superviser les élections législatives organisées le 27 avril 1958 par les autorités togolaises et elle a donné à ce contrôle la même portée qu'à un plébiscite. Pour comprendre ce détour, il faut rappeler que le Conseil de tutelle avait refusé le 13 août 1956, d'assurer la surveillance du referendum projeté par la France et donnant aux Togolais le choix entre un nouveau statut et le maintien du régime de tutelle. Le referendum en question eut bien lieu le 28 octobre 1956 et donna une forte majorité en faveur de la suppression de la tutelle (3). Mais, comme la consultation avait eu lieu sous le contrôle exclusif des autorités françaises, l'Assemblée générale ne crut pas devoir accéder immédiatement à la demande de levée de la tutelle; elle décida d'abord d'envoyer sur place une Commission chargée d'examiner l'application du nouveau statut (Résolution 1046 (XI) du 23 janvier 1957), puis, à la demande des autorités locales soucieuses de sortir du provisoire, accepta de superviser les prochaines élections générales qui devaient avoir lieu en 1958. La Résolution 1182 (XII) du 29 novembre 1957 établit nettement un lien entre les élections sous le contrôle des Nations Unies et la levée de la tutelle puisque l'Assemblée générale

Une interprétation identique de la portée de ces élections générales est donnée par le Commissaire des Nations Unies dans la conclusion de son rapport:

*Si, comme l'a maintes fois répété le gouvernement togolais au cours de nos discussions, ces élections n'étaient que la mise à exécution d'une réforme intérieure, c'est-à-dire l'application du suffrage universel au renouvellement de la Chambre des députés, et n'exigeaient aucune législation extraordinaire ou exceptionnelle, chacun cependant était convaincu qu'un événement historique était en marche qu'augurait la présence d'une mission de supervision des Nations Unites. Chacun avait de grandes appréhensions quant au résultat du scrutin et à ses répercussions sur l'avenir du territoire, selon le choix qui serait fait... Il n'y a pas le moindre doute dans mon esprit que le résultat d'ensemble des élections reflète fidèlement les vœux de la population du Togo quant à la désignation de ses élus à la Chambre des députés. Cette constatation est de la plus haute importance parce qu'elle signifie que la nouvelle Chambre a véritablement le droit de parler au nom du peuple togolais... Le scrutin du 27 au viri peut être considéré comme un événement historique dans l'évolution du Togo vers la réalisation des fins du régime de tutelle. «

L'exemple du projet de supervision des élections générales au Ruanda-Urundi n'est pas moins caractéristique. Dans sa Résolution 1579 (XV), en date du 20 décembre 1960, l'Assemblée générale se déclare:

« Consciente de la responsabilité qui lui incombe de veiller à ce que la surveillance des élections par l'O.N.U. soit efficace et que les élections qui fourniront la base de l'indépendance du territoire se déroulent dans des conditions satisfaisantes de telle sorte que leurs résultats ne soient entachés d'aucun doute et ne puissent donner lieu à aucune contestation. s

Pour atteindre cet objectif, l'Assemblée générale a demandé le renvoi des élections prévues pour le mois de janvier 1961 et leur report à une date plus éloignée permettant à l'Assemblée générale de :

Quant à la Résolution 1605 (XV) du 21 avril 1961, elle conteste la représentativité d'« organes de gouvernement qui ont été établis au Ruanda-Urundi par des moyens irréguliers et illégaux » et fonde explicitement la nécessité de l'intervention des Nations Unies sur l'obligation d'assurer une consultation régulière.

Dans ces trois cas, l'exigence de l'O.N.U. a donc porté sur la forme de la consultation. Le contrôle exercé par l'organisation internationale est destiné à garantir la régularité et la sincérité des opinions exprimées par la population — dès qu'un doute apparaît sur les conditions dans lesquelles cette population a été antérieurement consultée ou s'apprête à être consultée.

Cette interprétation peut être confirmée, a contrario, par l'exemple du Cameroun sous administration française. La Résolution 1349 (XIII), adoptée par l'Assemblée générale le 13 mars 1959, a fixé la levée de la tutelle au

1° janvier 1960. Cette décision, qui ne comporte pas de recours au plébiscite ou à la supervision des élections par les Nations Unies, est longuement motivée par l'examen de la situation locale et par les garanties ou promesses fournies par les autorités camerounaises quant à l'existence ou au rétablissement des libertés fondamentales et à l'organisation de nouvelles élections générales immédiatement après l'indépendance. On peut estimer que l'Assemblée générale a interprété d'unc manière trop optimiste la situation intérieure au Cameroun, mais la motivation de la décision prise fait nettement ressortir que les garanties exigées par les Nations Unies portent sur la liberté d'expression et sur la régularité du mandat en vertu duquel les autorités locales solicitent l'indépendance. Si ces conditions sont déjà réunies, l'Assemblée générale le constate et consent à la levée de la tutelle sans autre formalité; si le doute subsiste quant à l'existence de ces conditions préalables, l'Assemblée générale intervient soit en organisant un plébiscite, soit en exigeant la supervision des élections.

En l'état actuel des choses, la jurisprudence de l'Assemblée générale de l'O.N.U. paraît donc bien commandée par un double souci : consulter les populations quand le sort de la collectivité en tant qu'entité politique distincte se trouve en cause; assurer la liberté d'expression dans tous les cas où la situation locale ne permet pas de dégager clairement la tendance dominante de l'opinion sur l'avenir du pays. Si tels sont les principes qui paraissent avoir guidé les choix de l'Assemblée générale, il convient de préciser que l'organe en question n'est aucunement lié, pour l'avenir, par les décisions précédentes. Dans la limite des principes très généraux posés par la Charte, l'Assemblée générale est libre d'apprécier souverainement chaque situation particulière et de décider de l'organisation d'un plébiscite.

Les initiatives prises par l'Assemblée générale quant à la nature et aux modalités de la consultation démontrent d'ailleurs l'étendue des pouvoirs de cet organisme et la liberté d'interprétation dont il dispose.

2) La nature de la consultation,

Il n'appartient pas seulement à l'Assemblée générale de décider de l'organisation d'un plébiscite. Elle peut et elle doit aussi déterminer l'objet de la consultation. La nature et le contenu des opérations placées sous le contrôle des Nations Unies varient en effet d'un cas à l'autre en fonction des options qui sont prises par l'Assemblée.

On a déjà observé que, dans le cas du Togo sous administration française, l'Assemblée générale s'est contentée de la supervision des élections générales, en se réservant le droit de fixer le sort définitif du territoire après consultation de l'autorité administrante et des autorités issues des élections contrôlées par les Nations Unies. Il s'agit, dans cette hypothèse, d'une consultation indirecte.

Dans les autres cas, les populations intéressées ont été directement consultées sur leur sort. Mais c'est l'Assemblée générale elle-même qui a fixé, pour chaque territoire, les termes de l'option proposée aux populations. Pour le Togo et le Cameroun sous administration britannique, la question posée concernait uniquement le statut international du territoire (maintien de la tutelle ou intégration à un Etat voisin). Dans le cas du Samoa occidental la consultation portait à la fois sur le statut politique interne, défini par la Constitution du 28 octobre 1960, et sur l'indépendance sur la base de ladite Constitution. Le plébiscite avait donc ici une double portée, constitutionnelle et internationale.

Le cas du Ruanda-Urundi est encore différent puisque la consultation placée sous le contrôle des Nations Unies avait un double objet : d'une part les élections générales au suffrage universel, d'autre part un referendum sur le point de savoir si les habitants du Ruanda désiraient conserver la monarchie.

C'est cependant dans le cas du Togo et du Cameroun sous administration britannique que l'Assemblée générale a pris les plus grandes responsabilités et, il faut bien le reconnaître, les plus grands risques. Les Togolais ont eu à choisir, le 9 mai 1956, entre le maintien de la tutelle ou le rattachement à la Côte de l'Or devenue indépendante. 42 % ont opté en faveur de la première solution et 58 % en faveur de la seconde. Les résultats auraient certainement été différents si l'Assemblée générale avait posé la question sous une autre forme pour tenir compte du courant favorable — au moins dans une partie du territoire — à la réunification des deux parties du Togo sous la forme d'un Etat indépendant.

Le choix exercé par l'Assemblée générale n'a pas été moins important pour la solution de l'affaire du Cameroun. Dans un premier plébiscite, qui n'a pu se dérouler qu'au Cameroun septentrional le 7 novembre 1959, l'option offerte portait sur le maintien de la tutelle ou sur le rattachement au Nigéria. La première solution l'emporta nettement par 70 546 voix contre 42 788. Or, le second referendum, qui a pu être organisé les 11 et 12 février 1961 dans les deux parties du Cameroun, ne comportait plus qu'une option entre le rattachement au Nigéria ou à la République du Cameroun. L'absence d'une tierce solution — en l'espèce l'indépendance pure et simple — a été considérée comme regrettable dans le rapport établi par le Commissaire des Nations Unies au sujet du Cameroun méridional :

« Au début de la préparation du plébiscite, des questions ont fréquemment été posées aux observateurs et au personnel du plébiscite touchant l'absence d'une troisième option prévoyant l'indépendance pure et simple du territoire... Il est certain qu'à ce moment là une partie considérable de la population aurait souhaité une option de cette nature... »

Il n'y a pas lieu de prendre parti ici sur l'opportunité des choix effectués par l'Assemblée générale entre les différentes solutions possibles. Il suffit de constater que les décisions prises par les Nations Unies ont orienté, dès le départ, les différents plébiscites. Il n'était évidemment pas concevable, sous le prétexte d'appliquer le droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes, d'offrir aux populations consultées une gamme de solutions qui eût entraîné la dispersion des votes et la confusion des résultats. Aussi bien le point le plus délicat dans l'organisation d'un plébiscite n'est-il pas tant la décision de principe que la détermination des termes de l'option proposée aux électeurs. C'est bien l'Assemblée générale qui a tranché cette question capitale en fonction de l'interprétation qu'elle a donnée des intérêts majeurs des populations consultées.

3) Les modalités de la consultation.

L'Assemblée générale a également fixé, dans ses Résolutions, les modalités de la consultation. Certes, l'organisation du plébiscite incombe, comme nous le verrons, aux autorités locales. Mais l'intervention des Nations Unies a déterminé la procédure et le cadre de la consultation.

En ce qui concerne la procédure, l'exigence posée par l'Assemblée générale concerne la liberté d'expression mais aussi la définition du corps électoral. La règle générale est celle du suffrage universel des adultes (l'âge de la capacité électorale étant fixé à 21 ans). Cette initiative équivalait, pour la plupart de ces territoires, à une innovation révolutionnaire. Le cas est particulièrement net pour le Samoa occidental dont les dirigeants proposaient, conformément à la tradition locale, l'application d'un mode de suffrage restreint fondé sur le vote des seuls chefs de famille (mataï). C'est d'ailleurs selon ce procédé qu'avaient été élus, en 1957, les membres de l'Assemblée législative responsable de l'élaboration de la Constitution soumise au plébiscite. L'Assemblée générale n'a pas été sensible à l'argument et elle a exigé, comme dans les autres plébiscites, que la consultation prévue ait lieu au suffrage universel direct des adultes. De ces décisions concordantes, on peut déduire que le recours à ce mode de suffrage constitue, au regard des Nations Unies, une condition nécessaire de l'exercice du droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes.

Mais il existait une autre difficulté à résoudre au sujet du mode de décompte des voix. Fallait-il considérer le territoire sous tutelle comme une entité et apprécier les résultats dans leur ensemble; ou bien pouvait-on diviser le territoire en plusieurs zones dont le sort individuel serait déterminé par le jeu des majorités? L'Assemblée générale a recouru successivement aux deux procédés. Dans le cas du Togo sous administration britannique, elle a refusé, contrairement aux conclusions de la mission de visite, de dénombrer séparément les voix dans le Nord et dans le Sud du pays. La solution unitaire a prévalu et tous les ressortissants du Togo ont suivi le sort fixé par la majorité de la population, bien que les habitants du Togo méridional aient manifesté leur hostilité à l'union avec la Côte de l'Or. Cette solution est d'autant plus curieuse que l'Assemblée générale a adopté la solution inverse dans le cas du Cameroun : deux consultations distinctes ont été organisées le même jour, dans le Nord et dans le Sud et, sur le vu des résultats, le Nord a été rattaché au Nigéria et le Sud à la République du Cameroun. Si les résultats avaient été totalisés et considérés uniquement dans leur ensemble, comme au Togo, la solution du rattachement à la République du Cameroun l'eût emporté par 331 530 voix contre 244 037 (4).

On ne saurait mieux souligner l'importance des décisions prises par l'Assemblée générale. Encore une fois leur opportunité n'a pas à être appréciée ici. Mais si l'on se place au point de vue de l'efficacité, il est certain que l'intervention de l'Assemblée générale a permis de trancher des questions délicates au sujet desquelles les parties intéressées auraient eu beaucoup de mal à trouver un accord. L'utilité d'un arbitrage extérieur aux parties en cause est incontestable; mais un tel arbitrage n'aurait pu être obtenu si l'Assemblée générale n'avait pas été l'autorité qualifiée pour décider souverainement des conditions de cessation de la tutelle.

C'est également l'existence du régime de tutelle qui va faciliter l'exécution des opérations du plébiscite.

LE DÉROULEMENT DU PLÉBISCITE

Il ne suffit pas de décider de l'opportunité d'une consultation populaire, ni de fixer ses objectifs et ses modalités. Il faut encore en assurer l'exécution dans des conditions qui ménagent la liberté d'expression mais aussi le maintien de l'ordre public. Les difficultés à surmonter sont, par définition, redoutables puisque le plébiscite a précisément pour objet de trancher une contestation entre deux ou plusieurs solutions qui divisent l'opinion publique locale et qui suscitent la convoitise de tierces puissances. A ces obstacles qui tiennent à la nature même du plébiscite venaient s'ajouter, dans les cas qui nous intéressent, des difficultés particulières tenant à la nature du terrain et du milieu socio-politique : difficultés de communication, encadrement insuffisant des populations par une administration moderne, introduction de procédures électives dans des pays où l'éducation politique - sinon parfois l'instruction tout court - peut être notoirement insuffisante. La moindre erreur de manœuvre risque de provoquer des troubles graves et de fausser le résultat du scrutin.

ces difficultés et prendre directement en mains l'organisation des plébiscites. Elles ont bénéficié du concours des autorités locales qui ont assumé la responsabilité de l'organisation juridique et matérielle de la consultation prescrite par l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies. Dans la plupart des cas, c'est la puissance administrante qui est intervenue. Cela a parfois soulevé des difficultés: le Togo et le Cameroun sous tutelle britannique étaient administrés, en vertu des accords de tutelle, comme partie intégrante de la Côte de l'Or et du Nigéria. Or, ces deux territoires se trouvaient directement intéressés au résultat du plébiscite. Il fallait donc prendre une série de mesures pour éviter l'intervention et la pression des autorités et des forces politiques de la Côte de l'Or et du Nigéria et, pour cela, isoler tant bien que mal les territoires où le plébiscite devait avoir lieu. L'Assemblée générale a formulé des principes à cet égard et c'est principalement l'exécution de la résolution 1473 (XIV) par le Royaume-Uni que conteste la République du Cameroun. Mais quels que fussent les problèmes à résoudre, les puissances administrantes ne pouvaient esquiver une responsabilité étroitement liée à la mission qu'elles avaient reçue des Nations Unies. Elles ont pris les mesures législatives et réglementaires nécessaires, en désignant un haut fonctionnaire pour exercer la responsabilité principale de l'opération. Dans le cas du Togo, sous administration française, ces attributions ont été exercées par le Gouvernement et le Parlement togolais à qui la République française avait déjà délégué une partie de ses compétences. En aucun cas, les représentants de l'O.N.U. ne sont intervenus directement dans la préparation ni dans le dérou-lement du plébiscite ou des élections.

Leur rôle s'est limité à deux fonctions — au demeurant capitales : surveillance et consultation. Les deux fonctions sont étroitement liées dans la pratique, mais il est utile de les dissocier au stade de l'analyse pour bien comprendre en quoi a consisté l'intervention des Nations Unies dans la préparation et dans le déroulement de ces consultations.

1) La mission de surveillance.

Le Commissaire élu par l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies et les membres de son personnel ont, avant toute chose, un rôle d'observation justifié par la nécessité de rendre compte à l'Assemblée générale des conditions dans lesquelles la consultation s'est déroulée. La surveillance porte aussi bien sur la phase préparatoire que sur les opérations directement liées au scrutin.

a) Au cours de la phase préparatoire, la surveillance doit tout d'abord s'exercer sur tous les mécanismes juridiques mis en œuvre : législation ou réglementation du droit de suffrage, du mode de scrutin, du découpage électoral, des garanties administratives et judiciaires offertes aux électeurs, aux partis et, éventuellement, aux candidats, etc. Cette tâche incombe plus spécialement au chef de la mission, c'est-à-dire au Commissaire des Nations Unies, qui, pour recueillir plus facilement ces informations, doit rester en contact permanent avec les autorités qualifiées pour prendre ces mesures. Mais les textes et les règles de droit ne sont pas seuls en cause. Leur application soulève une masse de problèmes : il suffit de songer aux formalités d'inscription sur la liste électorale dans des pays où l'état-civil est à peine ébauché et où l'analphabétisme est encore largement répandu; il faut aussi vérifier sur place si les consignes destinées à assurer la liberté de propagande sont effectivement respectées, veiller à ce que les termes de l'option proposée à la population soient bien connus et aussi bien compris, etc. Pour toutes ces tâches, le Commissaire des Nations Unies est assisté d'un certain nombre d'observateurs répartis sur le terrain, dans des secteurs déterminés, dès l'arrivée de la mission des Nations Unies. Ces observateurs sont chargés de suivre dans le détail toutes les opérations préparatoires au plébiscite ou aux élections et de signaler immédiatement au Commissaire les incidents ou les anomalies qui peuvent se produire à l'échelon local. Grâce à ce réseau d'observateurs, la mission des Nations Unies peut, dans chaque territoire, avoir une vue précise et détaillée de la préparation au plébiscite.

b) Au stade final, c'est-à-dire au cours des opérations de vote et de dépouillement, la mission de surveillance revêt une importance beaucoup plus grande encore: il s'agit, pour les observateurs des Nations Unies, de contrôler la régularité du scrutin, de déceler les fraudes et d'éviter toute falsification des résultats. Le contrôle exige ici la présence physique des observateurs auprès des bureaux de vote et des centres de dépouillement. Bien que tous ces lieux ne puissent être visités le jour même du scrutin en raison du nombre insuffisant d'observateurs, le contrôle a été assez étendu pour que les Nations Unies aient, en général, une vue convenable de l'ensemble du scrutin.

Enfin, les observateurs des Nations Unies ont à rendre compte des réactions provoquées dans leurs zones respectives par l'annonce des résultats du scrutin.

La réunion de tous ces renseignements doit permettre à l'Assemblée générale de porter une appréciation solidement étayée sur la régularité et, par voie de conséquence, sur la validité du plébiscite. Aussi bien aurait-on pu, théoriquement, s'en tenir à ce stade de la surveillance du plébiscite par les agents des Nations Unies. Les Commissaires désignés par les Nations Unies ont cependant interprété leur mission d'une manière plus extensive; ils ont estimé qu'il ne suffisait pas de comptabiliser les irrégularités commises par les autorités responsables du plébiscite et qu'il valait mieux s'efforcer, dans toute la mesure du possible, de les prévenir afin de ne pas compromettre le résultat de l'opération. Cette conception de leur tâche a conduit les Commissaires au plébiscite — sous le couvert de la fonction consultative — à une coopération étroite avec les autorités locales.

2) La fonction consultative.

Les informations reçues par le Commissaire au plébiscite, dans le cadre de la mission de surveillance, permettent de déceler, au jour le jour, les irrégularités qui peuvent survenir dans la conception et dans l'exécution des opérations préparatoires au plébiscite. Il est dans la logique du système de contrôle que le Commissaire des Nations Unies porte au moins à la connaissance des autorités responsables les irrégularités commises par rapport aux prescriptions de l'Assemblée générale. Les groupes minoritaires ou les partis d'opposition n'ont d'ailleurs pas manqué d'alerter les agents des Nations Unies et de dénoncer devant eux les pratiques ou les règles qu'ils considèrent comme des manœuvres de la puissance administrante ou des autorités locales. Le Commissaire et ses adjoints se sont trouvés ainsi placés dans une position d'arbitre qui les a incités à intervenir activement dans la préparation de la consultation.

Cette intervention n'a jamais pris la forme d'une substitution aux pouvoirs des autorités compétentes pour organiser le plébiscite. Elle a revêtu, selon les cas, des modalités différentes.

Dans l'hypothèse la plus favorable, les autorités locales ont soumis au Commissaire les projets de lois ou de décrets et ont sollicité son avis avant de les publier — au besoin après rectification. Une coopération aussi étroite n'a pu toujours être réalisée. Quand les textes essentiels ou les mesures les plus importantes avaient été prises avant l'arrivée sur place de la mission des Nations Unies, il ne restait au Commissaire d'autre ressource que de critiquer les dispositions qui lui paraissaient contraires aux prescriptions formulées par l'Assemblée générale pour la conduite du plébiscite. Enfin, le Commissaire pouvait signaler aux autorités compétentes les incidents de toute nature survenant au cours de l'exécution des mesures législatives ou réglementaires, soit en attirant son attention sur l'inconvénient de telle pratique, soit en demandant des éclaircissements sur tel ou tel fait, soit en recommandant de prendre les dispositions nécessaires pour éviter le renouvellement de telle ou telle manœuvre.

Dans l'ensemble, les autorités locales ont accepté loyalement cette coopération, comme en témoigne l'abondante correspondance échangée avec la mission des Nations Unies. Les autorités locales n'ont pas toujours aligné leurs positions sur celles du Commissaire; mais elles l'ont fait dans la plupart des cas. Quand elles ont maintenu leur point de vue, elles ont été obligées de le justifier publiquement.

Le rôle de conseiller ou d'arbitre joué par le Commissaire a été poussé si loin qu'on a vu, dans certaines circonstances, les autorités locales se retourner vers lui pour lui demander d'intervenir en vue d'éviter des incidents qui auraient pu compromettre le succès du plébiscite. C'est ainsi que le Commissaire au Togo sous administration française a pu, sur requête formelle du gouvernement togolais, prévenir une grève générale que les syndicats menaçaient d'organiser pour protester contre la lenteur de la procédure d'inscription sur les listes électorales.

Si la coopération a été la règle au sommet, elle a été aussi pratiquée à la base. Les observateurs des Nations Unies ne se sont pas toujours contentés de surveiller passivement les opérations. On les a utilisés pour contribuer aux campagnes d'information destinées à éclairer les populations sur la portée du plébiscite; on a eu aussi recours à eux pour instruire de leurs devoirs les citoyens désignés pour constituer les bureaux de vote ou les équipes de scrutateurs. Ce sont là des tâches qui relèvent de l'assistance technique.

Qu'il s'agisse de la surveillance des opérations ou de la mission de contrôle et d'assistance, le contrôle exercé par les Nations Unies n'a pas été un vain mot. La présence et l'action positive du Commissaire et des observateurs ont garanti, aux yeux des populations, l'impartialité de la consultation et ont constitué un précieux facteur du maintien de l'ordre au cours de cette phase délicate où se jouait le destin du territoire. Mais elles ont aussi permis de fournir à l'Assemblée générale des éléments d'appréciation objectifs sur le déroulement et sur les résultats de la consultation. Il appartient en effet au Commissaire de présenter, sous forme de rapport synthétique, l'ensemble des observations faites au cours de sa mission. Les rapports constituent une précieuse source de documentation, grâce à une relation détaillée des événements et aux appréciations qui sont portées sur l'enchaînement des faits et sur le comportement des hommes. Mais ce rapport ne constitue qu'un élément du dossier. C'est à l'Assemblée générale et à elle seule qu'il appartient d'en tirer les conséquences politiques et juridiques.

L'INTERPRÉTATION DES RÉSULTATS

Dans les plébiscites ordinaires, le résultat du scrutin peut emporter de plein droit la décision. S'il y a eu contrôle international des opérations, la Commission compétente se borne à donner officiellement connaissance des résultats; l'exécution de la décision populaire incombe alors aux parties en cause qui devront régler entre elles les conditions dans lesquelles s'effectue la succession aux compétences territoriales.

Dans le cas des consultations supervisées par les Nations Unies, il en va différemment. Le choix populaire n'est qu'un élément de la situation. La décision finale appartient à l'Assemblée générale qui dispose d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire d'appréciation quant à la validité, à la signification et à la portée des résultats.

1) Appréciation de la validité des résultats.

Le rapport établi par le Commissaire au plébiscite contient normalement tous les éléments d'appréciation quant à la régularité et à la validité du plébiscite. Mais l'avis formulé par le Commissaire ne lie ni le Conseil de Tutelle ni l'Assemblée générale qui peuvent parfaitement se prononcer en sens contraire. En fait, cette situation ne s'est pas présentée. La conclusion des cinq rapports fournis par les Commissaires était favorable à la régularité et à l'impartialité des consultations. Le Conseil de Tutelle et l'Assemblée générale n'ont pas remis en question la validité des quatre plébiscites ni celle des élections générales au Togo sous administration française. Mais ils étaient en droit de le faire et il suffit d'imaginer une situation plus confuse ou un rapport aux conclusions plus hésitantes pour apercevoir l'importance du rôle de l'Assemblée sur ce point.

Mais il ne suffit pas de considérer les résultats comme régulièrement acquis; il faut encore en dégager la signification.

2) Appréciation de la signification des résultats.

La clarté des résultats obtenus par la méthode du plébiscite masque souvent des situations complexes qui laissent à une autorité extérieure et supérieure aux parties une marge importante d'appréciation. Les Commissaires des Nations Unies n'ont pas manqué de constater le trouble suscité auprès des électeurs par l'incertitude de tel ou tel choix qui leur était proposé. Ainsi les Togolais et les Camerounais sous administration britannique pouvaient légitimement s'interroger sur la portée exacte de l'union de leur territoire avec la Côte de l'Or, le Nigéria ou la République du Cameroun. Les modalités de cette union pouvaient varier sensiblement selon le rapport des forces politiques à l'intérieur des nouveaux Etats promus à l'indépendance ou selon l'aménagement interne (centralisation ou fédéralisme) qui prévaudrait dans ces collectivités de rattachement. De même les électeurs samoans pouvaient se demander quelle était la portée de la liaison établie par le plébiscite entre les deux questions qui leur étaient soumises puisque l'une portait sur le texte d'une Constitution et l'autre sur l'accès à l'indépendance sous le régime de cette Constitution. Sur ces divers points, l'Assemblée aurait pu intervenir pour préciser la signification du vote. Si elle ne l'a pas fait, c'est parce que de son avis les circonstances consécutives au plébiscite ont dissipé ou atténué rapidement les incertitudes qui pouvaient hypothéquer le résultat du scrutin. Mais il est au moins deux cas où l'Assemblée générale a tranché des questions litigieuses en imposant sa propre interprétation du plébiscite.

Pour le Togo sous administration britannique, on pouvait se poser la question de savoir comment interpréter un vote qui avait donné, dans le Nord du territoire, une majorité pour l'union avec la Côte de l'Or et, dans le Sud, une majorité favorable au maintien du régime de tutelle. Le Commissaire des Nations Unies n'avait pas pris parti sur la question, se contentant de présenter le décompte des voix par circonscriptions. L'Assemblée générale, confirmant sa décision antérieure, a refusé de distinguer les votes du Nord et du Sud et n'a considéré que les résultats globaux favorables à l'union avec la Côte de l'Or. Une interprétation différente aurait aussi bien pu prévaloir.

Le second cas concerne l'interprétation, par l'Assemblée générale, des résultats du premier plébiscite organisé dans le Cameroun septentrional. Ayant à choisir entre l'union au Nigéria et le maintien du régime de tutelle, les électeurs s'étaient prononcés à une nette majorité en faveur de la seconde solution. Le Commissaire des Nations Unies a estimé, dans son rapport, que ce vote exprimait surtout une « protestation contre le système d'administration locale en vigueur au Cameroun septentrional» et que la population avait entendu manifester sa volonté de voir aboutir rapidement des réformes. Il n'empêche que les électeurs avaient formellement écarté la solution du rattachement au Nigéria. L'Assemblée générale, entérinant ici l'interprétation suggérée par le rapport du Commissaire au plébiscite, a estimé que ces résultats n'étaient pas décisifs et elle n'a pas hésité à organiser quelques mois plus tard dans le même territoire un nouveau plébiscite offrant aux électeurs le seul choix entre le rattachement au Nigéria ou à la République du Cameroun - c'est-à-dire excluant délibérément la solution en faveur de laquelle venait de se prononcer la majorité du corps électoral du Nord Cameroun.

L'Assemblée générale n'est donc pas liée par les résultats du vote — même quand ceux-ci expriment une opinion parfaitement claire. Elle peut faire prévaloir librement sa propre interprétation jusqu'à remettre en question le bien-fondé du choix qu'elle avait elle-même suscité.

3) Décision finale.

A plus forte raison, l'Assemblée est-elle seule compétente pour entériner le choix des populations et transformer celui-ci en une décision ayant autorité sur le plan international. Certes le fondement juridique de la décision prise demeure la compétence dont jouit l'Assemblée générale pour déterminer les conditions de la levée de la tutelle. Dans le cas du Togo sous administration française (Résolution 1253 XIII du 14 novembre 1958), l'Assemblée générale a simplement pris acte du fait que les conditions fixées par la Charte se trouvaient réunies et elle a laissé à la puissance administrante et aux autorités locales le soin de décider de la date à laquelle l'accord de tutelle cesserait d'être en vigueur. Mais dans le cas d'union entre un territoire sous tutelle et un Etat voisin, l'Assemblée générale a formellement approuvé la mutation territoriale et chargé la puissance administrante de prendre les mesures nécessaires à son exécution. C'est ainsi que la Résolution 1044 (XI) en date du 13 décembre 1956 « approuve l'union du Togo sous administration britannique à une Côte de l'Or indépendante et invite en conséquence l'Autorité administrante à prendre les mesures nécessaires à cette fin » avant de statuer sur la levée de la tutelle.

La formule utilisée pour le Cameroun britannique associe expressément les mutations territoriales à la levée de la tutelle puisque l'Assemblée générale, dans sa Résolution 1608 (XV) du 21 avril 1961 :

Décide que, les plébiscites ayant eu lieu séparément avec des résultats différents,

Decide que, les pieniscites ayant eu lieu separement avec des resultats differents, l'Accord de tuttelle... prendra fin... dans les conditions suivantes:
 a) en ce qui concerne le Cameroun septentrional le 1ºr juin 1961, au moment où le Cameroun septentrional s'unira à la Fédération de Nigéria en tant que province séparée de la Région nord de la Nigéria;
 b) en ce qui concerne le Cameroun méridional, 1ºr octobre 1961, au moment où le Cameroun méridional s'unira à la République du Cameroun.

On peut donc affirmer que l'Assemblée générale, s'appuyant sur les résultats du plébiscite, a statué souverainement sur le sort des territoires dont elle avait jusqu'ici assuré la gestion sous le régime de la tutelle. Les populations ont bien été conviées à faire connaître leurs préférences. Mais c'est l'Organisation des Nations Unies qui a seule qualité pour provoquer la consultation, en contrôler le déroulement et en interpréter, politiquement ct juridiquement, les résultats.

L'Assemblée générale a ainsi affirmé dans ce domaine son pouvoir de décision. Elle procède à un véritable arbitrage politique sans chercher à obtenir le consentement des parties en cause. Elle se considère comme l'autorité qualifiée pour décider souverainement des conditions de cessation de la tutelle.

Dans le cas du plébiscite concernant le Cameroun sous tutelle britannique, la solution adoptée par l'Assemblée a soulevé une vive opposition; lorsque le rapport du Commissaire des Nations Unies fut examiné par le Conseil de tutelle le 10 avril 1961 le représentant de la France a indiqué son intention de demander l'invalidation du plébiscite au Cameroun septentrional. Devant la Quatrième Commission le Ministre des Affaires étrangères de la République du Cameroun a critiqué le comportement du Royaume-Uni qui n'ayant pas, avant la consultation populaire, procédé à la séparation administrative du Cameroun septentrional d'avec le Nigeria qu'avait prescrite l'Assemblée générale, avait, de ce fait affecté les résultats du plébiscite; celui-ci, en effet, s'était déroulé en présence de fonctionnaires et de policiers nigériens.

Cependant par 59 voix contre 2 et 9 abstentions la Commission devait se prononcer pour le projet de résolution entérinant les résultats du référendum. La France, le Cameroun, des Etats africains d'expression française avaient été absents lors du vote pour marquer leur protestation.

En séance plénière le 21 avril 1961 des protestations solennelles s'élevèrent contre la décision de l'Assemblée générale prise par 64 voix contre 23 avec 10 abstentions et proclamant le rattachement à la Nigeria.

La République du Cameroun a alors décidé de saisir la Cour internationale de Justice sur la base de la clause de juridiction obligatoire contenue dans l'accord de tutelle du 13 décembre 1946 relatif au Cameroun sous administration du Royaume-Uni, avant l'expiration de la validité de celui-ci. Le 31 mai 1961 il a formé une requête contre le Royaume-Uni dans laquelle sont invoqués tout à la fois des manquements à l'accord de tutelle et à la résolution 1473 (XIV) relative à la séparation administrative du Cameroun septentrional et de la Nigeria. Certains griefs se rapportent directement au plébiscite : « les conditions fixées par le paragraphe 4 de la même résolution visant l'établissement des listes électorales ont été interprétées de manière discriminatoire »; « les actes des autorités locales pendant la période précédant le plébiscite et durant les opérations électorales ont modifié le déroulement normal de cette consultation et ont entraîné des suites contraîres à l'accord de tutelle ».

La Cour doit donc se prononcer sur la question de savoir si le Royaume-Uni a ou non respecté certaines obligations résultant de l'accord de tutelle. Sans doute la résolution de l'Assemblée générale fixant le sort du territoire sous tutelle n'est elle pas soumise à la censure de la Cour, mais la République du Cameroun, en contestant la légalité du comportement de la puissance administrante peut espérer un arrêt qui déciderait que le plébiscite a eu lieu dans des conditions contraires aux principes posés par l'Assemblée générale elle-même. C'est la première fois que la Cour est appelée à connaître au contentieux d'une affaire qui concerne un domaine dans lequel l'Assemblée générale possède un pouvoir de décision. Si juridiquement la constatation de l'irrégularité du comportement britannique ne peut affecter la décision politique prise par l'Assemblée, elle ne devrait pas manquer de comporter des conséquences sur le plan politique, tout au moins dans les rapports entre les Etats directement intéressés.

L'O.N.U. est trop décriée aujourd'hui pour qu'on ne souligne pas les expériences où son action a été bénéfique. Il semble que tel ait été dans l'ensemble le cas pour l'organisation de plébiscites ou la supervision d'élections dans les territoires sous tutelle. Des mutations territoriales ou politiques ont pu être accomplies sans trouble grave. Le fait est d'autant plus remarquable que les populations consultées sur leur sort faisaient pour la plupart l'apprentissage des mécanismes élémentaires de la démocratie.

Mais si les initiatives prises par les Nations Unies ont abouti à des résultats heureux, il ne faut pas oublier les conditions dans lesquelles ces expériences ont eu lieu. Les territoires sous tutelle constituaient un terrain particulièrement favorable : l'Assemblée générale est maîtresse de leur sort, au moins en ce qui concerne les conditions de la levée de la tutelle; les puissances administrantes, soucieuses d'être déchargées de leurs responsabilités, ont coopéré de bonne grâce avec l'O.N.U. pour organiser ces plébiscites; enfin les populations locales se sont vu offrir en général des solutions qui, sous une forme ou sous une autre, constituaient pour elles une promotion conforme au mouvement général vers l'indépendance. Le succès réel des plébiscites s'explique donc bien plus par la technique du régime de tutelle - dont ils constituent la phase ultime - que par la vocation propre des Nations Unies à arbitrer les litiges politiques ou territoriaux qui subsistent à l'heure actuelle dans le monde. Aussi bien l'O.N.U. a-t-elle échoué dans l'entreprise lorsqu'il s'est agi d'organiser des consultations en Hongrie ou au Cachemire, sans avoir obtenu l'accord préalable des Etats ou des forces politiques intéressées. Aucune résolution n'a pu être adoptée pour le Cachemire et la résolution adoptée pour la Hongrie le 9 novembre 1956 est restée lettre morte.

C'est pourquoi il n'est pas possible de tirer de ces expériences isolées des conclusions trop optimistes, L'O.N.U. n'a réussi à mener à bien ces plébiscites que parce qu'elle avait la faculté de les entreprendre et la possibilité de les faire exécuter. Elle ne dispose malheureusement, à l'heure actuelle, ni de l'autorité morale ni de la force matérielle qui lui permettraient d'imposer son concours et son arbitrage à des parties récalcitrantes. Le droit des peuples à disposer d'eux-mêmes est un idéal respectable. Sa mise en œuvre, qui aboutit généralement à remettre en question l'ordre existant, exige cependant un degré de solidarité et une discipline collective qui ne semblent pas encore être atteints au sein de l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

ANNEXE DOCUMENTAIRE

Togo sous administration Britannique

Texte de base : Résolution 944 (X) prise par l'Assemblée générale le 15 décembre 1955. Date du plébiscite : 9 mai 1956.

Questions posées :

1) Voulez-vous l'union du Togo sous administration britannique à une Côte de l'Or indépendante?

2) Voulez-vous la séparation du Togo sous administration britamique de la Côte de l'Or et le maintien du régime de tutelle en attendant que l'avenir du territoire soit définitivement fixé?

Résultats du plébiscite :

pour l'union avec la Côte de l'Or : 93 095 voix.
 pour le maintien du statu quo : 67 492 voix.

Rapport établi par M. Espinosa y Prieto, Commissaire au plébiscite, Document A/3173 du 5 sept. 1956.

I. Plébiscite au Cameroun septentrional

Texte de base : Résolution 1350 (XIII) adoptée par l'Assemblée générale le 13 mars 1959. Date du plébiscite: 7 novembre 1959.

- Questions posées:

 1) Désirez-vous que le Cameroun septentrional fasse partie de la région du Nord de la Nigéria lorsque la Fédération nigérienne accèdera à l'indépendance?

 2) Préférez-vous que l'avenir du Cameroun septentrional soit décide plus tard? Résultats du plébiscite :

pour le rattachement; 42 788 voix.
 pour le maintien du statu quo: 70 546 voix.

Rapport établi par M. Djalal Abdoh, Commissaire au plébiscite, Document A/4314 du 2 décembre 1959.

II. Plébiscites au Nord et au Sud Cameroun

- Textes de base:

 pour le Cameroun méridional: Résolution 1352 (XIV) adoptée par l'Assemblée générale le 16 octobre 1959.

 pour le Cameroun septentrional: Résolution 1473 (XIV) prise par l'Assemblée générale le 12 décembre 1959.

Date du plébiscite : 11 et 12 février 1961.

- Questions posées:
 1) Désirez-vous accéder à l'indépendance en vous unissant à la République camerounaise indépendante?
 2) Désirez-vous accéder à l'indépendance en vous unissant à la Fédération nigérienne indépendante?

Résultats du plébiscite :

- Cameroun septentrional:
 + rattachement au Nigéria: 146 296.
 + rattachement à la République camerounaise: 97 659.
 Cameroun méridional:

+ rattachement au Nigéria : 97 741. + rattachement à la République camerounaise : 233 571.

4 666 NON.

AMENDEMENT DE L'ARTICLE 50, ALINEA A) DE LA CONVENTION RELATIVE A L'AVIATION CIVILE INTERNATIONALE Comme nous l'avons relaté dans deux chroniques précédentes (1), les élections du Conseil de l'O.A.C.I. aux dixième et douzième sessions de l'assemblée (1956 et 1959) ont suscité des débats prolongés sur le sens et la portée de l'article 50, alinéa b) de la Convention de Chicago relative à l'aviation civile internationale. Finalement, lors de sa douzième session, l'Assemblée a temporairement modifié son règlement intérieur pour que l'élection practice as shown in the Congo operation, based as it is on Article 40. The matter may be restated as follows:

If a matter is giving rise to apprehension relating to the maintenance of peace and security, but is a potential threat rather than an actual threat, and is causing international friction rather than a breach of the peace, then in spite of an objection under Article 2(7)—the Security Council may recommend measures under Chapter VI, for the question has become one of international concern; if the question has given rise to a finding under Article 39, then enforcement measures under Chapter VII may be ordered, and Article 2(7) ceases to be operative. If there has been a finding under Article 39, and the Security Council decides to make recommendations or to apply provisional measures under Article 40 rather than to order an enforcement action under Articles 41 and 42, then the situation-being one which is 'ripe for enforcement action', even though such action has not been ordered—also becomes unfettered by the reservation in Article 2(7). However, if there is no finding, implied or express, under Article 39, and there is only a question of international friction, no recommendations under Chapter VII may be made in the face of an objection on grounds of domestic jurisdiction; though in certain circumstances, where the element of international concern becomes pronounced, action may be available to the Council under Chapter VI.

d. That the United Nations may always act where a question of self-determination is involved

In comparatively recent times a new claim is being made by those who support the extension of the influence of the United Nations in certain matters traditionally within the reserved domain. This claim asserts that the right to self-determination is a legal right, backed by a legal obligation, and not merely a 'pious hope, devoid of legal substance'. In the contemporary world situation, where anti-colonialism has assumed vital dimensions, this claim has become exceedingly significant, and merits detailed considera-

Article 1 of the Charter of the United Nations, which sets out the Purposes and Principles of the Organization, declares as the second of these the development of 'friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples . . .'. And again, Article 55 considers that friendly relations between nations are 'based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples'; while in Chapter XI, which is concerned with Non-Self-Governing Territories, Article 73 notes that members assuming responsibility for such territories are 'to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions'.

The question has therefore arisen of how far these articles may be cited as authority for the taking of action of various kinds by the United Nations in the face of an objection based on Article 2(7). In other words, does the existence of a 'self-determination' element in a situation otherwise internal give that situation the requisite international element to remove it from the domain of questions 'essentially within the domestic jurisdiction'? The answer to this problem must in turn depend on whether the self-determination provisions in the Charter give rise to international legal rights and obligations, or whether they are merely generalized aims.

If such a right does exist, it must be acknowledged to be a fairly new one. The Aaland Islands dispute, though not directly in point, 40 tends to support this; and the report of the Commission of Jurists, dealing with the substance of the dispute, observed that positive international law did not recognize the right of self-determination of peoples to separate themselves from the state to which they belonged. 41 Nor, it would seem, did it recognize the right of self-determination of peoples to free themselves from the rule of those states by whom they were colonized, even if they did not 'belong' to such states.

The practice of the United Nations in this complex area of international affairs is very revealing and its importance can hardly be exaggerated. By resolution 545 (VI) the Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to draw up recommendations concerning 'international respect for the self-determination of peoples'. Accordingly, the Commission on Human Rights adopted two resolutions 12 which came before the Assembly for adoption at its seventh session. After a discussion in which objections were raised on the grounds of Article 2(7), the General Assembly agreed to 43 an amended version of the first of these resolutions. The preamble referred to the provisions on self-determination in Articles 1(2) and 55, and paragraph 2 of the operative part stated that:

2. The States Members of the United Nations shall recognize and promote the realization of the right of self-determination of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and trust territories who are under their administration and shall facilitate the exercise of this right by the peoples of such territories according to the principles and spirit of the Charter of the United Nations in regard to each territory and to the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, the wishes of the people being ascertained through plebiscites or other recognized democratic means. .

^{40.} This dispute arose between Sweden and Finland over title to the Asland Islands which were under the de facto rule of Finland. The Swedish Govt declared that the peoples of those islands wished to join Sweden, and therefore requested a plebiscite. Finland asserted that as the islands came under its territorial sovereignty, the matter was one of domestic jurisdiction.

D.I.L.-8

Thus the argument that the manner in which a state applied the principle of self-determination fell essentially within the domestic jurisdiction failed to hold sway;48 and the United Nations found that it was not debarred by Article 2(7) from recommending that a member state organize a plebiscite to determine the aspirations of a minority group. 46 Events had already moved far since the report on the Aaland Islands dispute.

Meanwhile the Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to continue preparing its recommendations on this topic. 47 The Commission then submitted its recommendations for the examination of the Social Committee of the Economic and Social Council.48 One of the recommendations urged the Assembly to establish a Special Commission to examine any situation resulting from an alleged denial or inadequate realization of the right of self-determination, 'which falls within the scope of Article 14 of the Charter and to which the Commission's attention is drawn by any ten members 49 This proposal met some opposition on the grounds that it would constitute an interference in a matter of domestic jurisdiction, and the matter was referred back to the Commission on Human Rights for consideration in the light of this objection. 50

During this reconsideration some representatives asserted that the realization of self-determination fell essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of states, 51 being a matter of the political structure of states. It was also observed that both Article 1(2) and Article 55 referred to the 'principle' of self-determination, and not to the 'right' of self-determination. 52 These delegates thought it significant that no Charter article granted the Assembly competence to implement this 'principle' in Article 2(1), although by contrast, implementation of the purpose of Article 1(1) was provided for by Article 11, and implementation of that of Article 1(3) was provided for by Article 13. However, these objections were strongly opposed, 53 and the Commission on Human Rights reaffirmed its previous recommendation, 54 which was duly sent on to the General Assembly by the Economic and Social Council.⁵⁵ The General Assembly was also asked to consider a draft resolution of the United States which, noting that differences of opinion had been revealed, requested that the General Assembly set up an Ad Hoc Commission to conduct a study of the concept of self-determination.

The Assembly eventually dealt with the matter at its twelfth session, where it adopted a resolution repeating the terms of Article 2(1) and stating that disregard for the right of self-determination (the word 'right' was used in preference to 'principle') undermines the basis of friendly relations among nations. Thus the relationship between self-determination and legitimate international concern is spelled out. This relationship is a vital one, because the principle of self-determination and the maintenance of international peace and security are inseparable: people seeking independence from those unwilling to grant it, or in any event unwilling to grant it on the terms demanded, are likely to disturb the peace. This highlights in acute form the difficulty that the Charter fails entirely to provide for the enforcement of that peaceful change which justice requires. The operative part of the resolution declares that:

(a) Member States shall, in their relations with one another, give due respect to the right of self-determination;

(b) Member States having responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing territories shall promote the realization and facilitate the exercise of this right by the peoples of such territories.56

For several years the agenda of the General Assembly included an item entitled 'Violation by France in Morocco of the principles of the United Nations Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights'. 57 The representative of France consistently maintained that the question of Morocco was a matter of domestic jurisdiction, while certain others contended that Moroccan sovereignty had been recognized by France in signing the Act of Algeciras and the protectorate treaty, and that certain measures of the French Administration in that territory were contrary to the principle of self-determination.⁵⁸ Moreover, it was contended that the situation in Morocco was a 'menace to international peace in that part of the world'. The resolution adopted by the General Assembly at its seventh session, on the recommendation of the First Committee, appealed for a continuation of negotiations and referred to Article 1(2) of the Charter, which mentions self-determination, as well as to the Charter provisions for the maintenance of peace. 59 The following year, in spite of objections raised on the grounds of Article 2(7), the First Committee adopted a draft resolution 60 which

The General Assembly, Recognizing the right of the people of Morocco to complete self-determination in conformity with the Charter, Renews its appeal for the reduction of tension in Morocco and urges that the right of the people of Morocco to free democratic political institutions be ensured.

However, this draft resolution failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority in the Assembly, and hence was rejected. The issue was never again clearly posed in this case,62 as by the next year Franco-Moroccan negotiations were in fact imminent, and at the Assembly's eleventh session Morocco was admitted to membership.

Similar issues were presented by the Tunisian question. At its seventh session the General Assembly was presented with a complaint that the French Administration in Tunisia had violated human rights and the principle of self-determination. Again, it was contended that France had undertaken to respect Tunisian sovereignty in signing the protectorate treaties. 63 The French delegation protested on grounds of Article 2(7), and boycotted the discussions of the First Committee. 64 The General Assembly, on the recommendations of that Committee, eventually adopted resolution 611 (VII), 65 which referred to Article 1(2), inter alios, and expressed the hope that the parties would continue negotiations on an urgent basis with a view to bringing about self-government for Tunisians in the light of the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations . . .

The following year the First Committee adopted a draft resolution which referred in unequivocal terms to the right of self-determination. 66 However, this resolution failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority in the Assembly. 67 At the ninth session, those states requesting the inclusion of the Tunisian item upon the agenda now categorized it as 'a threat to world peace' 8 As negotiations between the parties were now in progress, the Assembly postponed consideration of the item.

At the eleventh session Tunisia was admitted to membership in the United Nations.

Although in both these cases the strongly worded resolutions of the First Committee citing a right to self-determination failed to be adopted in plenary, it is significant that they only failed through inability to muster a two-thirds majority. Already a simple majority in plenary believed such resolutions to be valid, and the implications of this trend have been sustained.

In 1955 the question of Algeria-alleging a threat to the peace and breach of the Charter provisions on self-determination 70-came before the Assembly, where, after its inclusion upon the agenda,71 it was decided to proceed no farther.72 When the question was brought before the Security Council, and violation of human rights was added to the charges,78 the Council decided, by 7 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, not to include the matter in its agenda. 74 In both organs France contended that the matter was one of domestic jurisdiction, as Algeria was part of metropolitan France—an argument it has consistently maintained. The failure of the Council to include the matter in its agenda at this stage was partly because of weight given to this argument, and undoubtedly partly for reasons not based on Article 2(7).75 The points raised on the question of self-determination are very instructive, however. Some claimed that Article 2(7) was an overriding provision, applying to all aspects of the Charter, including that of self-determination. 76 On the other hand certain members felt that a principle which was enunciated in the Charter could not fall essentially within the domestic jurisdiction.77

At the eleventh session of the Assembly, a resolution was before the First Committee which requested France to recognize the right of Algeria to self-determination; to negotiate peaceful settlement with the Algerian nationalists; and to accept the aid of the Secretary-General in conducting negotiations. This resolution was defeated,78 and two more moderate resolutions went before the plenary meeting. 79 When neither of these received a two-thirds majority, the co-sponsors joined in framing a new resolution, which merely expressed the hope that a 'peaceful, democratic and just solution will be found'.80 Even less was achieved by the twelfth session of the Assembly: the First Committee had been unable to reach agreement on a resolution to present for adoption,81 and the Assembly

A 17-state draft resolution (A/C.1/L.194) recognizing the principle of self-determination for Algeria and calling for negotiations was modified by amendments (passed very narrowly) which substituted for the principle of self-determination the recognition that 'the people of Algeria were entitled to work out their own future in a democratic way' and proposed 'effective discussion' instead of 'negotiations' (A/C.1/L.196). The modified resolution failed to be carried.

merely noted that good offices had been offered, and hoped that a solution would be reached. Undeterred, by 1958 the Afro-Asian states were demanding the right of the Algerian people to independence83-a stronger term than self-determination. A Haitian amendment having been rejected, the First Committee adopted the resolution. The resolution was rejected by the Assembly, which failed by a single vote to provide the necessary two-thirds majority.

But behind the failure of the Assembly to pass a resolution favouring the right of self-determination for Algeria an interesting trend was taking place. The voting records show that not only was the cause of Algeria gaining in support, but that so was the idea that there might be a legal right to selfdetermination in these circumstances, even in spite of objections based on domestic jurisdiction.84

The year 1959 saw something of a change in the situation, as by the time the Assembly convened, President de Gaulle had already announced proposals for the self-determination of Algeria—without conceding at all the right of the United Nations to consider the matter. 53 Inevitably, many states now decided to abstain on any resolution, feeling that the progress made should not be jeopardized by putting France in a position of pressure.86 Other countries, such as Portugal and Spain, continued to oppose a resolution on grounds of Article 2(7). Because of these factors the resolution recommended by the Political Committee reverted to the concept of 'selfdetermination', rather than 'independence'. Although the resolution was carried in Committee, the prospects of success in plenary were negligible, and a new resolution, merely calling for the holding of talks to arrive at 'a peaceful solution on the basis of the right to self-determination' was put to the vote. It failed to be carried.⁸⁷ None the less, the principle of selfdetermination had now been accepted by all parties, and all the resolutions being put forward—which all gained simple majorities in the Assemblyreferred to the right of self-determination, and ignored argument based on

He estimates that the number of supporters for Algerian self-determination increased by 15 per cent in this period. This writer, agreeing with the trend, none the less feels that those figures have failed to take into account the increases in membership during this time, and that they consequently fail to reflect accurately the changes of view within the Organization on the Algerian question.

to self-determination.88 The basis of Assembly action, however, remained unclear, for while the right to self-determination was unequivocally recognized, the Assembly classified the situation as one constituting a threat to international peace and security-a position which would grant the Security Council exemption from a reservation of domestic jurisdiction, and which introduced for the Assembly a strong element of 'international concern'.

At the sixteenth Assembly, there were no opposing votes to a similar resolution89—similar, and yet extremely significant. This resolution carried no mention of a threat to the peace in the Algerian situation: rather, it referred to the recent Assembly resolution calling for an end to colonialism,90 and to the recognition of the right of self-determination and independence for Algeria. It declared itself concerned with the 'just implementation' of this right, and asserted that the United Nations had a role to play in securing it. The Assembly called for a resumption of negotiations. Thus the basis of the Assembly resolution, which is addressed to two specific parties, lies squarely on an international legal right to self-determination, and, by implication, the inapplicability of Article 2(7) to any situation concerning this right. At the seventeenth session of the General Assembly Algeria, having gained its independence, was admitted to membership.

In its early stages, those who would have had the General Assembly deal with the Cyprus question-'Application, under the auspices of the United Nations, of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples in the case of the population of the island of Cyprus'91—encountered much the same sort of difficulties as those which had arisen in the early stages of the Algerian question. The United Kingdom representative claimed that the matter fell essentially within his country's jurisdiction, as Cyprus was a British possession.92 This proposition received a certain amount of support, although others thought that a question of self-determination could not be essentially domestic.93 Interestingly, some representatives draw a distinction between minorities living within the metropolitan boundaries of states, and the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories.94 They claimed that the realization of the rights of the latter-though not of the former-was a matter of international concern governed by the provisions of Chapter XI. They thus acknowledged merit in France's denial of international competence in the Algerian question on the grounds that Algeria was a metropolitan territory. In the intervening seven years less and less emphasis has been put on this distinction, and with good reason. For a state to declare an overseas possession, whose population is of a different race and often in highly organized opposition, to be part of the metropolitan area may well be arbitrary and at variation both with the facts and with common sense. The claim has been heard more recently from Portugal about Angola,95 but, with the exception of South Africa, has received virtually no support. At some time in the past it may well have been an accurate factual description for colonial Powers to describe overseas possessions as part of the metropolitan territory. However, the factual relationship of these overseas possessions to the administering state has undeniably changed, and a claim that Article 2(7) applies to the situation must be rejected as being too much at variance with reality. As facts can make new law, so can they unmake old law.

In any event, when the question of Cyprus first arose, the Assembly was reluctant, both at its ninth and tenth sessions, to consider the problem. At the former, a resolution was adopted deciding not to do anything further at the present time (though there was some unresolved controversy as to whether this decision did or did not prejudice the question of the Assembly's competence),97 and the following year the Assembly decided not to include the item upon its agenda.98 The fact that the Greek demand for Cyprus independence was in reality aimed at enosis (union) of Cyprus with Greece undoubtedly influenced the voting at this stage. Some representatives agreed that there was a right of self-determination, but thought that the present case involved not the independence of the Cypriot people but a change of sovereignty from British to Greek hands, and hence should not be discussed. 99 Certain other states thought that Article 2(7) was an attribute of sovereignty; that Cyprus was being administered under Article 73; and that the rights flowing from administration were not the same as those flowing from sovereignty. In other words, Article 2(7) was only available to a state in relation to its homeland. 1

By the following year the situation in Cyprus had deteriorated and the United Kingdom requested that the Greek complaint, together with a complaint of its own charging support for terrorism, should be discussed.2 The United Kingdom representative took the opportunity to voice the opinion that the question of the circumstances in which the principle of self-

In 1957 the contention was voiced that the phrase 'self-determination of peoples' used in Article 1(2) referred only to the freedom of sovereign peoples to choose a government, and that neither that article nor any other provision in the Charter justified rebellion on the part of Non-Self-Governing Territories.5 A resolution before the Assembly urging negotiations to be resumed with a view to self-determination failed to obtain a two-thirds majority. In 1959 a resolution expressing confidence in a peaceful, just, and democratic solution was adopted without objection.7

It must therefore be conceded that, on the face of it, the practice of the United Nations in the case of Cyprus did little to advance a notion of the right of self-determination, and the inapplicability of Article 2(7). However, the motives behind the restrained behaviour of the Assembly rested on a variety of factors, including apprehension at the terrorism on the island of Cyprus, the belief that the Greek interest in the question prevented it from being a matter of self-determination, and the opinion that little progress would be made by condemnation.

The history of the drafting of International Covenants on Human Rights is also of interest to our discussion. Some representatives to the Third Committee contended that the inclusion in the Covenants of a provision on the right of self-determination would be incompatible with Article 2(7) of the Charter.8 Nevertheless, the following text was adopted9 for both draft Covenants:

1. All peoples have the right to self-determination. .

3- All the States Parties to the Covenant, including those having responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing and Trust territories, shall promote the realization of the right of self-determination, and shall respect that right in conformity with the provisions of the United Nations Charter.10

Presentation of the completed Covenants-including this article-to the Assembly, has been postponed from year to year, and the reactions of the Assembly as a whole are still not available. However, the significance of the adoption of such an article by a Committee which has run into so much stormy weather in its work cannot be ignored, and nor can its implications in relation to Article 2(7). By the time the Covenants are ultimately presented to the Assembly, the 'anti-colonial' majority is likely to be firmly entrenched, and it is very probable that these articles will be adopted.

All these cases which we have discussed, then, show a trend towards acknowledging self-determination as a legal right; and, moreover, a legal right based on provisions in an international instrument, and hence beyond the scope of the domestic jurisdiction reservation. The trend towards this position accelerated sharply in 1960, when a Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples was adopted by Assembly resolution by 90 votes to none, with 9 abstentions. By this the General Assembly declared that:

(2, All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

(3. Inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.

4. All armed action or repressive measures of all kinds directed against dependent peoples shall cease in order to enable them to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence, and the integrity of their national territory shall

5. Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories, which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence

How strong the wording of this resolution is needs no underlining. In it the right of self-determination is regarded not as a right enforceable at some future time under indefinite circumstances, but as a legal right enforceable here and now. Paragraph 3 does not overtly state that inadequacy of preparedness shall not be grounds for refusing independencerather it declares that this inadequacy shall not be used as a 'pretext' for delaying independence. Yet in reality, as the good faith of the colonial Power cannot be proved-and in the present political climate the onus is always on it to do so-the Declaration is widely taken to mean that all territories, no matter how unready, are entitled to independence. That this makes some worrying inroads upon the traditional criteria for statehood has already been mentioned in Chapter II. Even for a commentator favourably disposed towards a liberal interpretation of the right of self-determination this resolution has many undesirable aspects, and the total lack of opposition displayed reflects sadly upon the failure of those governments (such as that of the United Kingdom) who most loudly insist upon Big Power responsibility to vote against resolutions which they do not support when public opinion is mounted against them. (Parenthetically, it may be observed that the United Kingdom has followed a similar course in the Security Council resolutions on the Congo, frequently abstaining on—instead of voting against—resolutions which its later behaviour has revealed it to dislike.

The Concept of Domestic Jurisdiction in United Nations Practice

Though the grounds for disapproval of the resolutions seem less justified in that case, the principle remains the same.) The decision of the nine abstaining nations not to vote against the resolution rested on a variety of factors, high among them the fact that a large group of newly independent states had just been admitted to the United Nations, and unnecessary alienation of these countries was to be avoided. Moreover, Chairman Khrushchev was in New York conducting a remarkable propaganda campaign, and indeed it was he who had manoeuvred the Western colonial Powers into this position by sponsoring the Declaration. None the less, it must be acknowledged that there were no opposing votes, and that the number of abstentions was very low. The resolution must be taken to represent the wishes and beliefs of the full membership of the United Nations.

Nor has it been forgotten since. We have noted above 12 that the Algerian resolution of 1961—which for the first time unequivocally recognizes the Algerian right to self-determination—bases itself on the Declaration of the granting of independence. So does resolution 1650 (XVI) on the status of Algerian prisoners to France. So does the Security Council resolution of 9 June 1961 on Angola.13 It is significant that in the debates on this lastmentioned question, the representative of the Soviet Union was of the opinion that the reaffirmation by the Security Council of Assembly resolution 1603 (XV) on Angola, which in turn was based on the Granting of Independence resolution, had the effect of making that resolution mandatory. Further evidence that this resolution was not meant as a mere moral declaration is to be found in the decisions of the General Assembly on 27 November 196114 to create a seventeen-member committee to make recommendations on the implementation of the 1960 Declaration. All states administering trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories were called upon to 'take action without further delay with a view to the faithful application and implementation of the Declaration'. The resolution was adopted by 97-0, with 4 abstentions (France, South Africa, Spain, and the United Kingdom). In view of the lack of opposition registered both to the 1960 Declaration and to this resolution, it seems academic to argue that as Assembly resolutions are not binding nothing has changed, and that 'selfdetermination' remains a mere 'principle', and Article 2(7) is an effective defence against its implementation. To insist upon this interpretation is to fail to give any weight either to the doctrine of bona fides, 15 or to the practice of states as revealed by unanimous and consistent behaviour.

The development of the legal right of self-determination is being clearly shown by the case of Southern Rhodesia. There are, it should be said at this stage, two separate, though related, aspects to the Southern Rhodesia problem before the United Nations: the first of these concerns the implementation of Article 73(e) of the Charter, and obligations for the transmission of information by the United Kingdom under that Article; the second is about the right of the territory to independence. In other words, one aspect of the question is about what the United Kingdom can legally be expected to do, and the other is about the wishes of the peoples of Southern Rhodesia. It is the latter aspect which is relevant for our present discussion: the Rhodesian situation in the light of Article 73 will be discussed below. The Special Committee of Seventeen set up a sub-committee to report on Southern Rhodesia, 16 and after talks with United Kingdom officials, this sub-committee presented its report. 17 The report endorsed a three-Power resolution submitted by Ethiopia, Liberia, and Tunisia, 18 which considered that the territory of Southern Rhodesia has not attained self-government, and that the Assembly should take action to urge its conviction that the 1961 Constitution should be revised without delay. An Ethiopian resolution was also forwarded to the Assembly for consideration. 19 These in turn were noted in the report of the Special Committee, 20 and all these documents were put before the Assembly at its resumed sixteenth session. On 28 June the General Assembly adopted a thirty-eight Power resolution²¹ which had been based on the reports of the subcommittee and Committee of Seventeen. This resolution expressly refers to the failure of the United Kingdom to fulfil the requirements of paragraph 5 of the Declaration on the granting of independence (resolution 1515 (XV)), and affirms that Southern Rhodesia is not self-governing. It requests the United Kingdom to convene a constitutional conference to formulate a new Constitution to replace that of 6 December 1961, and urges that the rights of the majority be ensured on the basis of 'one man, one vote'.22 The Assembly indicates in this resolution what it understands by 'self-determination' by underlining that 'the vast majority of the people of Southern Rhodesia have rejected the Constitution' and that there exists a 'denial of equal political rights and liberties to the vast majority of the people of Southern Rhodesia'. At its seventeenth session the Assembly reiterated the right of Southern Rhodesia to self-determination, and urged the release of Mr Nkomo and other political leaders from detention.²³

These resolutions—though the United Kingdom rejected their validity, and took no part in the vote—clearly indicate that the great majority of states in the United Nations believe that a legal right of self-determination exists, and that neither Article 2(7) nor indeed domestic constitutional issues in general, can impede the implementation of that right and United Nations jurisdiction for that purpose. So irrelevant has Article 2(7) become to the Assembly in this context that it finds it permissible not just to call for negotiations for self-determination, but to make detailed observations on specific national constitutions and recommendations for their improvement. While the sub-committee on Southern Rhodesia had cautiously stated that it was not for it to say what the basis of an agreed Constitution should be, ²⁴ of the Assembly unequivocally called for:

the convening of a constitutional conference in which there shall be full participation of representatives of all political parties, for the purpose of formulating a constitution for Southern Rhodesia... which would ensure the rights of the majority of the people, on the basis of 'one man, one vote'. ²⁵

It therefore seems inescapable that self-determination has developed into an international legal right, and is not an essentially domestic matter. The extent and scope of the right is still open to some debate. We would suggest that at the present stage of development of international law the matter has become an international one within the following conditions: the Assembly may not prescribe an exact time for the granting of independence to a particular territory, though it may urge that this occur speedily. This may be deduced from the rejection by the Assembly of two Soviet proposals, the first of which26 would have proclaimed 1962 as 'the year of elimination of colonialism', and the second of which27 would have had the seventeenmember committee make recommendations 'on the immediate application of the Declaration and the completion of its implementation' by the seventeenth session. Until the 1960 Declaration on the granting of independence international jurisdiction in matters of self-determination was never claimed without there being offered an alternative ground of international jurisdiction to rebut any contention of domaine reservé. We have seen from the cases discussed above that this most frequently occurred in the form of references to the breach of human rights, or to international friction. While several of those resting on a breach of the 1960 Declaration still mention these alternative grounds of jurisdiction, there is a movement away from this tendency—the sixteenth session resolution on Southern Rhodesia being a case in point. Indeed, it would seem that legally this is no longer necessary—not, it must be emphasized, because the 1960 Declaration has binding authority (it has not), but because that Declaration, taken together with seventeen years of evolving practice by United Nations organs, provides ample evidence that there now exists a legal right of self-determination. Moreover, within certain limits, it is a right which does not admit of the reservation of Article 2(7). It should also be added that a denial of self-determination is now widely regarded as a denial of human rights, and as such a fitting subject for the United Nations.

such a fitting subject for the United Nations. If United Nations practice indicates that such a legal right does exist, does it tell us anything about the nature of the right? Most importantly, to what unit does the concept of self-determination apply? If the international order is not to be reduced to a fragmented chaos, then some answer must be provided to this question. The present stage of development of international law and relations, as exemplified by United Nations practice, does allow certain tentative observations to be made. Self-determination refers to the right of the majority within a generally accepted political unit to the exercise of power. In other words, it is necessary to start with stable boundaries and to permit political change within them. That the right of self-determination operates within generally accepted political units is an essential premise, for several reasons—first, without this qualification, all is in flux, and there is no constant factor at all; second, to withdraw this proviso would encourage impermissible use of force across state boundaries, an outcome which the United Nations can hardly encourage; and third, by and large the emergent states seem content so far to accept the colonial boundaries imposed on them. Indeed, there has been little sympathy shown by the Afro-Asians for those of their own group who have shown reluctance to build within the colonial frontiers which they have inherited. The failure of Morocco to attract any substantial support for her territorial claims in Mauritania, and the isolated position of Iraq in her claims to Kuwait may be cited as cases in point. Katangese aspirations to independence have similarly been repudiated by the Afro-Asians. This is, inevitably, to simplify the matter: the Iraqi and Moroccan claims, no matter what their merit, encroached upon the territory of potential new nations within striking distance of independence from colonialism. If an emergent state attempted to come to statehood with an extension to its colonial boundaries which marked a territorial gain from the colonial Power itself, and not from some other Afro-Asian country, it might well receive widespread support. But, for geographical reasons, this possibility does not arise, and in the event the fixed boundaries are acceptable. As for Katanga, the real basis of Afro-

Asian objections to its attempted secession lies in the role played by Western financial and mercenary interests, not in the sanctity of frontiers. None the less, the principle remains: for one reason and another, the idea that self-determination is to take place within acknowledged political units is widely accepted. It may be observed in this context that operative paragraph 4 of the Declaration on the granting of independence, after declaring that dependent peoples shall exercise their right to complete independence free from repressive measures and armed attack, goes on to state: 'and the integrity of their national territory shall be respected'.

If, then, the right of self-determination is the right of the majority within an accepted political unit to exercise power, there can be no such thing as self-determination for the Nagas. The Nagas live within the political unit of India, and do not constitute the majority therein. Their interests are to be safeguarded by Indian obligations on human rights and the protection of minorities. There is, however, a right of self-determination for Southern Rhodesia in so far as it refers to the right of the majority of peoples to exercise governmental control proportionate to their numbers.

Reference here to the rights of majorities is to be taken to mean the right of each man to one vote, ²⁸ rather than the a priori right of the majority to constitute the government. Self-determination does not necessarily involve the adoption of the Western system of parliamentary democracy, and if the representatives of the majority which constitute the government become impotent, and are replaced by one person (as, for example, in the French Fifth Republic), the continuing opportunity for universal suffrage nevertheless prevents this from being classified as a denial of self-determination.

The term 'self-determination' is at the present time being used to cover several similar, but not identical, situations. Traditionally this term referred to the desire of a race for independence, to the desire to take over the powers of government and remove the foreign ruling groups. So indeed was the desire of Cyprus to be free from British domination. However, it should perhaps be asked whether the same term 'self-determination' is really applicable to situations such as Southern Rhodesia, where the ejection of the foreigner is not paramount but the attainment of power is. Both governing and governed in Southern Rhodesia are Rhodesians; whereas in Cyprus the governed were Greek and Turkish Cypriots while the governing were English, and very much 'foreigners to be ejected'. It would perhaps be preferable to refer to the Cyprus type of situation (as it evolved after insistence on enosis was withdrawn) as a claim to independence, and the Rhodesian type as a claim to self-determination: this would represent a departure from the traditional use of the terminology, but would have the merit of greater descriptive precision. So far United Nations practice, however, refers to both types of situations as 'self-determination': moreover, recently there has been a tendency to use the terms 'self-determination' and 'independence' interchangeably, though it is quite possible for an independent state to deny the right of self-determination to its peoples. An example of this confusion of terminology may be seen by comparing paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Declaration of 1960.

The theory of self-determination represents an important movement away from the old legal view under which international law rights pertain only to states and governments, and not to groups or individuals. Given the present political climate, the right of self-determination is likely to continue to be presented in a racial context; though there is no inherent reason why the principle should not apply in a religious or purely party political situation.

e. That a reservation of domestic jurisdiction is inapplicable where United Nations action is occurring within a country at its own request

Under Articles 41 and 42 the Security Council may order United Nations enforcement measures. Obviously, the permission of the state against which these measures are directed is not required. It has been customary to obtain permission from a non-aggressor for United Nations para-military action in its territory,29 though the broad wording of Article 39 may make duties of both the United Nations and the host country may then be laid down in a Status of Forces Agreement, and this was in fact the case with the United Nations Emergency Force.30

So far, so good. However, a new claim has been raised in the case of the Congo, where the circumstances with regard to the presence of United Nations troops are similar, but not identical. It has been argued by some that in this case the request for United Nations military action has come from the Congo itself (whereas after Suez it was not specifically requested by Egypt), and that once this general invitation has been made to the United Nations, that body is rendered incapable of contravening the domestic jurisdiction of that state, so long as it acts within the fulfilment of its mandate, and not ultra vires. Given the fact that the United Nations is in the Congo at the request of that Government, it is argued, Article 2(7) ceases to be relevant to its actions. This view, it seems, has been widely offered by certain United Nations personnel in Leopoldville.

There seems little to justify this viewpoint, and much to condemn it, both legally and politically. The United Nations is clearly in the Congo at ^{29.} See 2nd Rep. of S-G on the Plan for UNEF (A/3276). 30. A/3526.

The Concept of Domestic Jurisdiction in United Nations Practice the request of the Government of that country.31 Domestic jurisdiction therefore becomes irrelevant so far as the presence of United Nations troops on Congo soil is concerned. However, practice shows clearly that beyond this point domestic jurisdiction has been in no way considered irrelevant by the United Nations troops in the Congo (ONUC). On the contrary, both ONUC and the Secretary-General have been at great pains to point out that their actions do not constitute an interference in the domestic affairs of the Congo; they have not suggested that they are not bound by considerations of Article 2(7) of the Charter. In so far as ONUC has a mandate to fulfil, it may be performing roles in certain areas normally reserved to the exclusive jurisdiction of the state:

the United Nations Force under the Resolution is dispatched to the Congo at the request of the Government and will be present in the Congo with its consent . . . it may be considered as serving as an arm of the Government for the maintenance of order and protection of life-tasks which naturally belong to the National authorities and will pass to such authorities as soon as, in the view of the Government, they are sufficiently firmly established. . . . 32

This does not mean, however, that the sovereign right of domestic jurisdiction can be safely-or legally-ignored by the United Nations at will. Beyond these rights of action expressly or by reasonable implication designated to it for the fulfilment of its mandate, ONUC remains bound by the provisions of Article 2(7). Where a right of action claimed is ambiguous or uncertain, the Security Council will be called upon to clarify the position in a new resolution. Even within the circumscription of fulfilling its mandate,33 ONUC's freedom of action is tempered by a basic condition-and one that has been made clear from the outset and acknowledged all through -namely, that: 'The Force . . . [cannot] be permitted to become a party to any internal conflict. A departure from this principle would seriously endanger the impartiality of the United Nations and of the operation.'34

The question of what action within normally domestic domains can be understood to be essential to ONUC in the fulfilment of its mandate—that is to say, what action has been requested by implication by the Congo-is obviously one of interpretation. This interpretation, as has been succinctly and convincingly explained by the late Secretary-General, can ultimately be gauged only by good faith:

the host government, when exercising its sovereign right with regard to the presence of the force, should be guided by good faith in the interpretation of the purpose of

S/4387); and the evacuation of foreign military and para-military personnel, not in the employment of the Central Govt (SC res. S/4741). 34. S/4389, p. 3.

the Force, [and] the United Nations, on its side, should be understood to be determined by similar good faith in the interpretation of the purpose when it considers the question of the maintenance of the Force in the host country. 35

Even with good faith on both sides, the precise delimitation of ONUC's mandate in the Congo is hard to ascertain. If the host country and the visiting force disagree as to what is an interference in domestic affairs, is the view of the host country to prevail? Congo practice strongly indicates a negative answer-the United Nations has insisted upon retaining its own right to interpret in the absence of either clear directives or an impartial third-party adjudication. Great confusion has arisen over what is the ONUC's proper role in the Congo. During the period when both Kasavubu and Lumumba were claiming to lead the only legal government, each complained that the United Nations was not acting specifically in support of his own Government;36 and that United Nations troops were merely standing by when actions detrimental to his own Government occurred. At the same time as being accused of omission, ONUC was also accused of commission in supporting the rival regime.³⁷ This type of accusation was frequently heard about the radio station and airfield at Leopoldville. The United Nations maintained the position that these were being used by both sides to fan unrest and violence, and that if it were to fulfil its mandate, it was necessary at times to control both of these strategic points. This policy met with opposition not only from the rival Congolese Governments but also from the USSR, which during this period demanded that all airports and radio stations should be placed at the disposal of the Lumumba faction.38 It will be recalled that eventually the radio station was reopened when a guarantee was received for the curtailment of inflammatory broadcasts; and the airfields were opened for all civilian, humanitarian, and peaceful purposes.3

Similar problems arose with regard to United Nations protection of personnel, and insistence upon the observance of the rule of law in these matters. Thus Kasavubu objected that Ghanaian troops had prevented Lumumba, whom he had arrested, from being brought before a magistrate. The lack of a warrant for such action did not deter him from accusing ONUC of interference in the internal affairs of the country.40 Yet when

This interpretation of the ONUC role was frequently denied by Lumamba (S/4441/Add. 7).
37. 'Whereas, on the pretext that the "Internal Affairs" of the country are involved, the United Nations remains inactive in the face of this situation and moreover the unwarranted occupation of the national airfields is preventing the legal government from accomplishing the task of safe-guarding the unity of the country and restoring order . . .' (A/4518). The UN is thus pincered between objections of omission and commission.

The Concept of Domestic Jurisdiction in United Nations Practice

Lumumba voluntarily withdrew from United Nations protection, the Organization was largely held responsible for his murder.41

The mutual 'dismissals' of Kasavubu and Lumumba also occasioned grave difficulties over the interpretation of domestic jurisdiction. Whether Kasavubu's dismissal of Lumumba was or was not valid depended upon an interpretation of the Loi fondémentale. After an initial suggestion that Kasavubu had the right to dismiss Lumumba, 42 the United Nations then adopted the preferable position that its role was not to interpret the constitutional law of the country, and it refused publicly to pass judgement on the matter. The United Nations has consistently adhered to this position, endeavouring to deal with all the various factions in the Congo; indeed, such a position logically flows from the avowed impartiality of ONUC in the domestic affairs of the Congo. However, the resolution of November 1961 may justify some concern on this point, for operative paragraph 8 states that 'all secessionist activities against the Republic of the Congo are contrary to the Loi Fondémentale.'43 It will be noted that the secession is not declared illegal because it is fomented by foreign elements (which is surely the crucial point), but rather because it is contrary to the Basic Law. The United Nations has thus taken it upon itself to pass judgement on the Loi fondémentale. The only defence that can be raised in favour of this paragraph is that it must be read in context, and as the rest of the resolution is full of references to the illegal actions of the mercenaries in Katanga, this particular paragraph must be taken to embrace this element. One can only regret that it is necessary to raise such defensive arguments, for inevitably the paragraph gives support to those who insist that the United Nations wants to end the Katanga secession and not merely to expel the foreign elements from influence in Katanga so that the Congolese may negotiate among themselves.

Many of these difficulties in interpreting the scope of the obligation to respect the domestic jurisdiction of the Congo have been resolved by the emergence of a comparatively strong central government which commands legal and effective authority. This in turn has led to the co-operation of the Congo Government with the United Nations, and hence the claim of domestic jurisdiction by that Government had been made less and less frequently.

^{41.} Yet see S/4571, ann. I & II, which contains an appeal by the S-G to Kasavubu to apply the rule of law, emphasizing that he is not interfering in internal affairs. Military action by the UN to enforce this would, however, have been regarded as interference by the S-G. With regard to the arrest of certain members of the Kivu Got who had declined UN protection, it was explained that once they had departed 'voluntarily or not, but while not being under UN protection, ONUC could not pursue and join battle with an ANC unit. That would have constituted a military initiative and an act of intervention, both of which are forbidden by the mandate of the force as laid down by the Security Council' (S/459).

^{42.} Which caused an objection from Lumumba to the effect that 'It is not for the Sccretary-General of the United Nations to interpret the Basic Law, that is the responsibility of the Congolese Parliament' (S/4498). 43. SC res. S/5002

Moreover, ordinances have been promulgated by the Central Government explicitly giving the United Nations certain powers of arrest which would otherwise have had to be implied. In addition, any conflict over spheres of authority in Katanga has been avoided by the enactment of an ordinance expelling all non-Congolese serving in the Katanga forces not under contract with the Central Government and requesting the assistance of the United Nations in putting this into effect. 44

The United Nations is under no legal obligation not to interfere in Katangese internal affairs. The right to the reservation of domestic jurisdiction in certain fields is one which is available to the legitimate government of the state, and not to its provincial authorities. Hence the control of radio station and airport of Elisabethville, done with the consent of the Central Government, cannot be said to constitute an infringement of Article 2(7).

f. That the General Assembly has authority to determine the territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applies

There has been a long-standing controversy in the United Nations as to the point at which United Nations interest in Non-Self-Governing Territories becomes an interference in the domestic affairs of an administering state. The provisions covering Non-Self-Governing Territories are to be found in Chapter XI of the Charter.

In 1946 the Secretary-General invited members to transmit their views on the factors to be taken into account in determining which territories were non-self-governing under Chapter XI, and to enumerate any such territories under their jurisdiction. 45 In reply, certain members thought that the term 'non-self-governing' should be defined, and suggested relevant criteria. Others thought that the determination of the territories to which any definition would apply was a matter solely for the decision of the administering state concerned.46

Because much opposition was expressed to any formal definition of 'nonself-governing',47 the Assembly merely passed a resolution listing 74 Non-Self-Governing Territories in respect of which members had agreed to supply information under Article 73(e).

In 1948, during a discussion in the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73(e), the Soviet representative declared that information transmitted by the Netherlands in respect of Indonesia was invalid, as Indonesia was an independent state. Though the issue was not decided upon, the Committee feeling it lacked competence, the point was made by some states—and disagreed with by others—that the determination of territories for purposes of Article 73(e) was reserved to the administering Power, and any attempt to perform this right by the Assembly would involve a decision on a constitutional relationship within the domestic jurisdiction of the metropolitan Power concerned.48

In 1948 the Assembly adopted an Indian proposal that administering states of Non-Self-Governing Territories should inform the United Nations of any change in the status of such a territory which caused it to consider that the transmitting of information under Article 73(e) was no longer necessary.49 Objections on grounds of domestic jurisdiction were raised by several administering states, 59 and were reiterated in communications to the Secretary-General. 51 In 1949 the Soviet Union went so far as to assert that information had to be continued until the Assembly formally decreed that Article 73(e) no longer applied to the territory.52

The resolution passed at the fourth session of the Assembly clearly indicated the international responsibility of the Organization when it stated that it was for the Assembly:

to express its opinion on the principles which have guided or which may in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the territories for which the obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73(e) of the Charter. . . . 53

It also provided for a Committee to be set up:

to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

Those supporting the resolution in the face of objections on domestic jurisdiction grounds insisted that under the Charter all members of the United Nations had a responsibility towards the Non-Self-Governing Territories. They also asserted that the Assembly must have the right to determine whether 'constitutional considerations' for not transmitting information were valid or not.54

In 1951 the Special Committee on Information did adopt a report on the factors to be taken into account when determining whether a territory was non-self-governing.55 However, from the discussions it was clear that it was conceded that it was not the task of the Committee to decide whether the inhabitants of any specific territory were non-self-governing, nor to pronounce on who had authority to make that decision. 56 These factors were incorporated into an Assembly resolution,57 which offered them for comment, and called for further study on them by an Ad Hoc Committee.

The Ad Hoc Committee similarly did not deal with the problem of where the authority lay to determine that a territory was no longer non-selfgoverning. By resolution 648 (VII) the Assembly provided that the factors could serve as a guide both for the Assembly and for those members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Yet another study was made by an Ad Hoc Committee, and at the eighth session of the General Assembly a resolution was adopted which now stated unequivocally that the annexed list of factors could be used so that 'a decision may be taken by the Assembly on the continuation or cessation of the transmission of information required by Chapter XI of the Charter'.5

Thus, after full inquiry, study, and discussion, the Assembly gradually resolved by evolution through a series of resolutions the problem of whether the determination of the territories to which Chapter XI applies is a matter of domestic jurisdiction. Both its resolution of 1953 and its consistent practice subsequently indicate that this can no longer be regarded as an exclusively domestic perogative. At its eighth session the Assembly, in agreeing with a communication from the United States that Puerto Rico was non-self-governing, reiterated its right to pass on this point;59 and this practice was repeated in the cases of Greenland, 60 Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, 61 and Alaska and Hawaii. 62 In each case, the relevant resolution contained the following preambular paragraph: "Bearing in mind the competence of the General Assembly to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter'. Separate voting on this paragraph has consistently prevailed over opposition by a minority of states. 63

The 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries has consolidated even more the practice of the Assembly on this question. The Special Committee of Seventeen which was set up to examine the progress in the implementation of this Declaration decided in March 1962 to consider whether Southern Rhodesia was in fact self-governing. The Committee noted that it was acting in accordance with the General Assembly resolution of 23 February 1962 which stated that it 'was mindful of the fact that the indigeneous inhabitants have not been adequately represented in the legislature and not represented at all in the government'.64

The Committee appointed a sub-committee to examine the question. The United Kingdom has insisted throughout that the Committee's action is ultra vires, that Southern Rhodesia has been fully self-governing since 1923, and that the United Kingdom Government is neither bound, nor constitutionally able, to submit information to the Assembly on that territory. The sub-committee found that Southern Rhodesia has not attained self-government.65 This finding was endorsed by the Special Committee66 and unequivocally confirmed by the General Assembly in its resolution 1747 (XVI). This resolution 'affirms that the Territory of Southern Rhodesia is a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI', and based this finding on the view that 'the vast majority of people of Southern Rhodesia have rejected the Constitution of 6 December 1961' and that 'equal political rights and liberties [are denied] to the vast majority of the people of Southern Rhodesia'. It may thus be seen that the Assembly has little doubt that it is authorized to pronounce on the applicability of Chapter XI of the Charter, and to comment on the relevant criteria for decision.

g. That the United Nations is entitled to request political information on Non-Self-Governing Territories under Article 73(e)

In a report of 31 October 194667 the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly 68 a summary of the information submitted to him under Article 73(e),69 together with the suggestion that an ad hoc committee of experts should be appointed to study the information. The colonial Powers opposed this suggestion on the grounds that the creation of such a committee would infringe their domestic jurisdiction under Article 2(7). The French delegate declared that:

Chapter XI was a Declaration involving an obligation but not providing for a medium of implementation. The only definite obligation imposed by the Charter was the transmission of specified information and it was silent as to what was to be done with such information. . . . 70

This viewpoint hardly seems to be in conformity with the principle of effectiveness in the interpretation of a treaty—a principle of no little importance when the treaty also happens to be an international constitutional instrument. Warning had already been given by the Secretary-General that:

the transmission of such information cannot be regarded as a mere formality. Its purpose and value depend on the contribution which can be made through it to an understanding and to the implementation of the principles . . . 71

The Philippine viewpoint seems more closely to conform to this aim, for that delegate suggested that a course of action which was not expressly prohibited was to be permitted if it was consistent with the objective in view. He thought:

It would be absurd to require the submission of information on dependent territories unless such information could be utilized for the promotion of the wellbeing and advancement of their inhabitants . . . [If] there was a lacuna in Chapter being and advancement or their innabitants... [II] there was a facuna in Chapter XI... [it] could be remedied by a reasonable interpretation, in keeping with the principle that any restrictive construction of an international agreement which would nullify or circumvent its manifest purpose should be rejected.⁷²

The United Kingdom thought that the information would be better studied by the Secretariat, as the proposed committee would have a political character. 73 Others, however, thought that the Secretariat would be inhibited in making recommendations or pointing out shortcomings.74 This latter view seems to have prevailed, for by resolution 66 (1), the Assembly decided to create the Ad Hoc Committee on Information.

The Ad Hoc Committee rapidly came face to face with the problem of whether political information was to be submitted under Article 73(e). Paragraph (e) refers to economic, social, and educational conditions, and no explicit mention is made of political conditions. However, several states thought that economic and social factors could not in reality be separated from political factors. The Committee arrived at the conclusion that the voluntary transmission of political information was in conformity with Article 73 and was to be encouraged.75 When its report was considered by the Fourth Committee of the Assembly, the representative of the USSR contended that voluntary transmission of information was inadequate, 76 and recommendation and criticism on such information could not infringe the sovereign rights of the Administering Power. Others found significance in the fact that the possibility of transmitting political information had been discussed at San Francisco77 and rejected; though the Indian delegate asserted that the reason for the non-inclusion of this provision in Article 73(e) lay elsewhere. 78 By a majority of one vote a Soviet amendment recommending' (in contradistinction to 'encouraging') the transmission of such information was adopted.79 When the matter arose in plenary session, states were heard to argue that the 'interests of the inhabitants' mentioned in paragraph 1 of Article 73 required that the United Nations demand political information.80 Pakistan contended that the relations between Non-Self-Governing Territories and colonial Powers went beyond the scope of domestic jurisdiction81-a view disputed by Belgium.82

The Assembly rejected the revised draft resolution of the Fourth Committee, and adopted the original draft resolution of the Ad Hoc Committee.83 The transmission of political information was thus to be encouraged, but remained voluntary. It also set up a Special Committee to examine and report on the information, overriding the objection of certain states that this would constitute an interference in their domestic affairs. Of the eight administering authorities, three-Belgium, France, and the United Kingdom-did not act upon the recommendation of the Assembly, and continued to limit the information they sent to subjects listed explicitly in Article 73(e). In 1948 the General Assembly adopted resolution 327 (IV), by which it expressed the hope that those who were not transmitting political information would do so. Significantly, however, an amendment was rejected by which the transmission of political information would have been made obligatory.84 In 1954, by resolution 848 (IX), the Assembly again urged the voluntary transmission of political information, and went on to state that the principles and objectives of Article 73 'relate to the political as well as the economic, social and educational advancement of the peoples concerned'. And again, in 1959, resolution 1468 (XIV) referred to the 'inextricable relationship between developments in political and functional fields'though it still fell short of suggesting that the transmission of political information is obligatory. No doubt it was to be expected that this legal distinction between what is desirable and what is obligatory would become blurred; and in April 1962 the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories for the first time examined information on political and constitutional developments.85 The United Kingdom, while continuing to maintain that the transmission of political information was not legally required, in September 1961 offered to transmit such information about its dependencies as a gesture of goodwill.86 Portugal refused to take a similar position, and indeed, has been unco-operative on the transmission of any adequate information on her territories. Resolution 1542 (XV) of the Assembly had reminded Portugal that it was obligated to transmit information, and pending the fulfilment of this obligation, authority was given to a committee of seven members to examine 'such information as is available', and to formulate observations and recommendations. The report of this Committee87 has not hesitated to examine political matters, though it remains unclear whether its parent body, the Committee on Information, now believes there to be a legal duty on the part of the Administering Authority to transmit developments on constitutional matters. It seems at the present moment that there is no clear duty to do this, no matter how desirable the practice would be; but that the Assembly has in part circumvented this difficulty by authorizing various bodies to examine such information as they themselves can obtain. The authority for this is felt to lie in the 1960 Declaration on colonialism, which expressly refers to political aspirations in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The United Kingdom, notwithstanding its gesture of goodwill on this question, has insisted that it is unable to supply constitutional information on Southern Rhodesia, as that territory is fully self-governing. It has been emphasized that the United Kingdom is not unwilling to provide reportsthough it believes it is not legally bound to do so-but rather that it is unable to do so, as it lacks authority over Southern Rhodesia for this purpose. The Assembly adopted the findings of the Committee of Seventeen that this territory is in fact 'a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI',88 and, by implication, the United Kingdom is considered to retain the customary obligations of an Administering Authority. It is perhaps significant that in the voting on this particular resolution the other members of the British Commonwealth-including Australia, Canada, and New Zealand-merely abstained, and did not either vote against the resolution or refuse to participate in the voting. Yet such states can hardly be accused of ignorance of the special relationship between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia.

LAW AND THE PROCESS OF DECISION IN THE POLITICAL ORGANS OF THE UNITED NATIONS (CONTINUED)

In the previous lecture, I endeavoured to show some ways in which the process of decision in the political organs is influenced by, and in turn influences, the normative conceptions of the international community. In the present lecture I shall continue with this theme and consider several problems which arise as a consequence of this interaction of law and politics and which bear especially on the complexities of interpretation and implementation of the Charter.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN INTERPRETATION AND RECOMMENDATION

It is perhaps useful at the outset to emphasize the distinction between the interpretation of the Charter and resolutions that are purely recommendatory. Typically, the U.N. political organs, in accordance with the Charter, submit "recommendations" to Governments, but an examination of such recommendations reveals that many of them are accompanied by assertions of legal rights and obligations under the Charter. Such assertions of law are advanced in the process of reaching recommendations; they may be stated in the resolutions or they may be implied from the consensus expressed in the debates. It is evident that these assertions are not themselves recommendatory; they are expressed by States or adopted by the organs as authoritative precepts derived from the Charter or accepted rules of international law. Frequently they set forth limitations on the competence or authority of the organs or procedures which they must follow; in some cases they are legal determinations of a substantive character which specify obligations of Members.1 The question of primary interest to the international lawyer has generally been the extent to which the interpretations reached by, or within, the political organs are to be regarded as legally authoritative when the organ has not been accorded the competence to make binding decisions. In considering this, one might start with the principle that an "authentic" interpretation of a treaty by the parties is legally binding on them to the same degree as the treaty itself.2 I believe it is generally accepted that this conclusion would hold for an interpretation of the Charter adopted by all the Members (or even "by the overwhelming majority" except for some abstentions) in the General Assembly; the interpretation would be characterized by international lawyers as having the same legal force and effect as the Charter itself.3 Moreover, there would seem to be no substantial reason why this conclusion would not be applied in cases where a virtually unanimous consensus in a matter of Charter interpretation is made known through statements and actions expressed separately by Governments either within or outside the United

1. The Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs (U.N. Secretariat publication No. 1955 V. 2) contains for each article of the Charter the decisions and relevant statements on the meaning of that article. Examples of resolutions that assert substantive obligations based on the Charter may be found, inter alia, in regard to apartheid, colonialism, use of nuclear weapons, outer space, and sovereignty over natural resources. They will also be found in connection with specific disputes and situations involving peace and security. See R. Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of the United Nations (1963); Castaneda, "The Underdeveloped Nations and the Development of International Law", 15 Int. Org. (Winter 1961) 38, 44-48.

3. See, Lachs "The Law in and of the United Nations" in 1 Indian Journal of International Law (April 1961) p. 429, 439. See Castaneda, op. cit. n. 1. 4. In the off-quoted statement on the interpretation of the Charter made at the San Francisco Conference, it is said that if an interpretation "is not generally acceptable it will be without binding force", thus in effect recognizing that an interpretation receiving general approval will be authoritative and binding. See Report of the Rapporteur of Committee IV/2, UNCIO Doc. 933, IV/2/42, Vol. 13 p. 710.

It is generally agreed that authentic interpretation does not require a particular procedure. See Oppenheim n. 9 supra, Lachs n. 10 supra, Ehrlich, "L'interprétation des traités", 24 Recueil des Cours (1928) p. 36.

However, when the proceedings do not reveal a general consensus, and particularly when there is a substantial difference in points of view, the foregoing analysis does not apply. The usual distinction then drawn is that between an interpretation of a treaty which is considered to be binding because it has been accepted by all of the parties and an interpretation which is rejected by some and therefore would be regarded as effective only if the treaty should be amended accordingly. This point is often bolstered by emphasizing that the political organs have not been granted authority to adopt binding decisions except in the limited cases covered by Chapter VII and certain organizational matters such as admission of members and financial assessments. 6

I do not wish to take issue with this conclusion, but I would observe that it does not entirely settle the question of the authority of such interpretation. There are two qualifications to be considered. In the first place we must take account of generally accepted practice regarding the competence of the organs to decide definitively certain issues. For example, the right of the United Nations General Assembly to determine which territories fall within the scope of Article 73 has received such continuing support that it may now be regarded as fairly well settled. My point here is that when the practice of states in the United Nations has served by general agreement to vest in the organs the competence to deal definitively with certain questions, then the decisions of the organs in regard to those questions acquire an authoritative juridical status even though these decisions had not been taken by unanimous decision or "general approval".8

In this way evolutionary growth in regard to fields of competence has an important positive effect on the law-making potentialities of the organs.⁹

The second qualification relates to the significance of conflicting interpretative positions which have not been resolved by a competent organ or in a clearly evidenced general consensus. It seems plain to me that such positions when taken by governments are not and should not be regarded as irrelevant to the meaning of the Charter norms. Official positions of States announced in the General Assembly or Security Council regarding their understanding of the obligations of the Charter cannot be considered in legal effect as no more than judgments of private persons. They constitute evidence of contemporaneous construction by the parties that is entitled to weight in determining the meaning and effect of a treaty provision. This is in line with accepted doctrine, expressed by the International Court of Justice in several cases recognizing that the views of the parties as to the meaning of an international instrument even if not binding are relevant evidence of the correct legal interpretation of the instrument.10

CRITERIA FOR CHOOSING BETWEEN CONFLICTING INTERPRETATIONS

If the interpretative statements of Governments have evidentiary value but are in disagreement, what criteria are available and appropriate for evaluating them and choosing between them? Such choices are of course often made: they are made by Governments in the political organs when faced with conflicting interpretation; they may on occasion be made by judicial tribunals; and they are of course frequently made by legal scholars who scrutinize and appraise positions from a relatively to be a contrary view, see Separate Opinion of Sir Percy Spender, relating to "Certain Expenses of the United Nations" Opinion. I.C.J. Reports 1962 pp. 186-197.

"disinterested" point of view. Each of these "decision-makers" will see the problem from a different perspective arising from the difference in their roles but all will be concerned with the criteria that may properly be employed in reaching an "interpretative" decision and justifying it to others. The last point warrants emphasis; for it must be borne in mind that even if a government decides (or thinks it does) for reasons of immediate advantage, it will still be required to justify that decision in terms of criteria and principles acceptable to others in the political organs and in the international community generally.

It is of course impossible to consider criteria and principles of interpretation without examining more closely than we have yet done the various types of norms contained in the Charter and the diverse questions of meaning and specification which they present. As a preliminary observation I would note that the application of all general propositions—whether legal or not—to diverse facts and events has necessarily a substantial degree of uncertainty or ambiguity; such general propositions have what logicians aptly describe as "an open texture". That of course does not imply that they are without any clear meaning; normally there will be some central cases in respect of which everyone may be expected to agree that the proposition applies. But there will also be, inevitably, an outer area of uncertainty—that is, there will be cases in regard to which there exist reasons for both asserting and denying that the general rule applies. 11

While this is true of many norms of the Charter, it is essential in considering the criteria of interpretation to bear in mind the great differences that exist in these norms in regard to their degree of generality and the nature of the choices they require. To show this, it seems convenient to employ four categories which serve roughly to bring out these differences: they are "rules", "principles", "standards" and "doctrine" (or "general theory"). 12 These are not, of course, hard and fast categories or refined from a logician's standpoint; they are simply terms which are commonly used and which suggest distinctions which are germane to the task of interpretation.

THE SPECIFIC "RULES"

The first category—the "rules"—refers to the norms which have relatively precise and explicit terms and which are generally intended to be applied without discrimination as to individual characteristics. In the Charter most of such specific rules concern procedure and organizational activities. Typical examples are those relating to composition of the organs: "the General Assembly shall consist of all Members...", "the Economic and Social Council of eighteen Members elected by the General Assembly", or on voting "Each Member shall have one vote." In these rules the terms used have generally accepted definitions in the context of U.N. procedures and other Charter definitions. Much as it may be desired, an increase in membership of the Economic and Social Council is not considered admissible under the existing Charter provisions; the text is regarded as explicit and conclusive on this point.¹³

What is important to bear in mind is that in saying a rule is regarded as "explicit", we mean that in point of fact its meaning is taken for granted at a particular time. It is, so to speak, a given datum, not subject to question at that time. But this does not mean that its "explicit" meaning may not be challenged, or indeed changed in another context. In the history of the United Nations many apparently precise rules have been interpreted anew in new situations. Leven a rule as explicit as that providing for a two-year term for non-permanent Members of the Security Council has on occasion been modified in practice; and the express requirement of a "concurring" vote of a Permanent Member has been interpreted to apply only if the Member actually casts an affirmative or negative vote and not if it abstains. But even in citing these examples, one should observe that in both situations, there was general support for the interpretation.

Other cases can be cited where majorities considered themselves clearly restricted by specific rules and required to reject proposals otherwise desired. My main point in this connection is not that specific "rules" do not require interpretation but rather that they contain key terms and expressions, the meaning of which is taken for granted in almost all cases which arise. (This is perhaps another way of saying their terms are definite and specific but it also suggests that such "precision" is always open to question.) We would be closing our eyes to a significant difference in practical interpretation if we ignored this large category of "specific" rules and treated the problem which they present as essentially no different from that raised by the more general norms.

THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES

The category of "principles" includes, of course, the broadly stated precepts of Article 2 of the Charter-such as the obligation to settle disputes by peaceful means, the prohibiton against the use of force, the duty to refrain from assisting a State against which the U.N. is taking preventive or enforcement action. Article 2 is not the only source of authoritative principles; they are found throughout the Charter, although not expressly designated as such. There are also general principles of law accepted as binding; such are the obligation to carry out agreements and the duty to make reparation for breach of obligations. All of these principles are invoked and appealed to as "law" in the same way as "rules", except that they are generally treated as higher in the normative hierarhy. However, the significant difference for the decision-maker arises from the much greater "generality" of the principles. Their key terms are often highly abstract-hence, applicable to an indeterminate series of events, which may be viewed as extending outward from a

"core meaning". Consider the various connotations which concepts like "force" and "political independence" can have in ordinary political usage. There are undoubtedly some core cases which everyone would say fall within those terms but in a large number of other situations there can be arguments for and against inclusion. Does "force" embrace economic boycott or financial support of subversive movements? Is "political independence" interfered with by "force" when an unpopular de jure government facing an insurection receives foreign military support?

Moreover, because principles are general and fundamental, they tend to clash with each other in specific cases-thus every principle in the Charter can be paired off with a contrary or opposing principle in the context of a particular situation. (This, by the way, would not be true of the category of "rules"there are no contraries in the Charter of specific precepts such as "each member shall have one vote".) Even the salient rule against force is "balanced by" the right of self-defence and collective enforcement measures and the most fervent supporters of the principle of self-determination have recognized the opposing claims of the obligation of peaceful settlement and the principle of "territorial integrity". This characteristic opposition of principles is not, as some have suggested, the result of political confusion or defective drafting; on the contrary, it is a desirable and necessary way of expressing the diverse and competing aims and interests of mankind. An attempt to eliminate such inconsistencies can only result in an artificial emphasis on some abstractions and a suppression of valid and basic human values. 16

From the standpoint of the "law-applying function", it is

Practice (1955) and Supp. No. 1 (1958) on Article 2 (4); Report of the Secretary-General of the U.N. on "The Question of Defining Aggression" General Assembly Official Records VII Session, Annexes to Agenda Item 54 pp. 17-81 (1952). apparent that the opposition and indeterminancy of the principles of the Charter call for a frame of reference that is quite different from that required in deciding the issues presented by specific rules. The importance of "dictionary" and "ordinary" meaning is greatly reduced, often indeed they have little significance; emphasis necessarily shifts to an assessment of a complex factual situation and a consideration of the consequences of a decision in the light of more basic values that are regarded as implicit in the Charter.

THE CATEGORY OF "STANDARDS" AND THE FACTS OF THE CASE

I have referred to a third category of norms as "standards". In this context, it refers to highly general prescriptions which involve evaluating the individual features of events. By contrast rules (and to some degree principles) assume a relatively uniform application, irrespective of individual characteristics, "Standards" in this sense are common in both public and private domestic law; notable examples are: "due care", "reasonable rates", "unfair competition", "good moral character". They are used to judge conduct of a kind which does not seem susceptible of treatment under more specific criteria and requires that each case be judged largely on its own facts.17 The Charter of the U.N. contains a number of these concepts: "good faith", "peaceloving", "with due regard to equitable geographical distribution." The organs may also be obliged to apply "standards" which are not expressly stated in the Charter but are necessarily implied by a principle or rule.

A good example of this is presented by the principle or right of self-determination. Neither the Charter nor "logic" provides specific criteria to determine what group or what territorial unit is entitled to exercise that "right" (recall the issues over Katanga, Cyprus, West Irian, Togo). 18 The organs must therefore—if they are to apply the principle of self-determination in specific cases—determine which territorial entity or group of persons is 17. See Dillard op. cit. n. 12.

the "appropriate" or "reasonable" unit in that case. The fact that a standard of this kind is used rather than a definition or rule shows that it has not been found possible to stipulate in advance which elements are decisive—in other words, that the judgments of what unit is appropriate for the purpose of self-determination depend so much on the individual and contingent facts of the case that it cannot be expected that a general formula will provide an adequate basis for decision. If it is evident that the problem of applying standards of this type to particular circumstances cannot be resolved by appeal to textual meaning or on the basis of legal formulae; it necessarily requires consideration of the basic aims of the Charter and of the "felt necessities of time and place". Obviously this has significance for determining which organ can best apply standards and what frame of reference is appropriate.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF "DOCTRINE" AND "GENERAL THEORY" OF THE CHARTER

We have not quite exhausted the classes of norms relevant to the interpretation concerning Charter principles. For over and above rules, principles and standards, there is a still more generalized category that may aptly be described as "doctrine" or "general theory" which comes into play particularly in cases of conflict between competing principles and in giving concrete meaning to broad concepts of the Charter. The influence of "general theory", in this sense, has been apparent in some of the great constitutional debates in the U.N.-for example that which took place in 1950 on the Uniting for Peace resolution or that in 1960 and 1961 on the legitimacy of the Congo operation. In the first case, the opposing positions were based in part on broad theoretical conceptions of the Charter which were at odds with each other: one could roughly be described as a collective security position, emphasizing the primacy of the responsibility to take "collective measures", the other treating as essential the unanimity rule of the Security Council and perhaps described as a type of balance of power conception.²⁰ Both of these theoretical constructions were justified by their respective advocates in terms of the essentials of Charter doctrine and therefore implicitly presented as governing the choice between competing interpretations.

In the second of the examples mentioned, that relating to the Congo operation, the different doctrinal conceptions of the Charter that seemed pertinent in the context of that debate were emphasized in Mr. Hammarskjöld's last Annual Report.²¹ He referred to one as a "static" conception in which the Organization was essentially "conference machinery" for the solution of conflicts of interest and ideology through expanded diplomatic facilities. In the opposing doctrine the Organization was also a "dynamic instrument of Government" through which international executive action would be undertaken on behalf of all Members in implementation of the purposes and principles of the Charter. Mr. Hammarskjöld went on to suggest these two different conceptions would lead to different emphasis and different interpretation of the major precepts of the Charter.

It may perhaps be questioned whether these and other theoretical concepts are appropriately classified as "legal" norms since they are not formulated as such in the Charter. But are not constitutions generally considered to have certain underlying and implicit premises, which are literally extra-constitutional, but which provide a "higher-law" rationale to justify choices between competing principles?²² (The concepts of popular sovereignty or of inalienable natural rights are obvious exam-

22. There are several references in opinions of the United States Supreme Court to the underlying premises or "inherent limitations" of constitutional provisions. Chief Justice Hughes stated "Behind the words of the constitutional provisions are postulates which limit and control". Principality of Monaco v. Miss. 292 U.S. 313, 322 (1934). ples). Concepts of this character play so significant a role that it would be myopic to exclude them from the categories of Charter norms.

THE COMPLEXITY OF THE INTERPRETATIVE TASK

No doubt these four categories of legal norms can be refined by further logical and syntactical analysis and replaced by more precise classification. Yet our analysis is sufficient to show that the organs face widely diverse tasks when they are called on to apply the "law of the Charter" to a complicated political situation. Certainly the words of the Charter must be the starting point, but as we have seen, in relatively few cases can the words provide a substantial part of the answer. In most cases the dictionary and the texts themselves can do little to resolve the issues which are presented as a result of generality, indeterminancy, conflicts and inconsistencies of the Charter norms. It is apparent from the various types of norms that the range of relevant considerations will vary considerably from problem to problem, but it is also clear that in a great many cases the organs have to evaluate complex situations in terms of a diversity of factors, including some which clearly involve judgements of "reasonableness", importance, intent, expectations and "necessity". Perhaps most important as we have seen is the requirement that the process of interpretation must include in many cases an assessment of the consequences of a decision on the major purposes of the Charter.23 For this reason, a constitutional instrument like the Charter should not be subject to the restrictive interpretation appropriate to "bargaining treaties of the traditional type" where the contracting parties acted in terms of precise interests on a basis of reciprocity. As Charles de Visscher has put it, "always of capital importance in the interpretation" of a treaty such as the Charter "is the master idea or fundamental conception" that led to its conclusion, and he cites by way of example of such fundamental conceptions "the

LETTER DATED 28 OCTOBER 1964 FROM THE PERMANENT REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC TO THE UNITED NATIONS ADDRESSED TO THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

I have the honour to enclose the text of the Declaration entitled "Programme for Peace and International Co-operation", adopted by the Second Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held in Cairo from 5 to 10 October 1964.

In view of the fact that the Declaration deals with items of which the United Nations is seized and which also appear on the provisional agenda of the forthcoming regular session of the General Assembly, I should be grateful if you would have the text of this Declaration circulated as a document of the General Assembly.

MILITARY PACTS, FOREIGN TROOPS & BAGDS

The Conference reiterates its conviction that the existence of military blocs, Great Power alliances and pacts arising therefrom has accentuated the cold war and heightened international tensions. The Non-Aligned Countries are therefore opposed to taking part in such pacts and alliances.

The Conference considers the maintenance or future establishment of foreign rilitary bases and the stationing of foreign troops on the territories of other countries, against the expressed will of those countries, as a cross violation of the sovereignty of States, and as a threat to freedom and international perce. It furthermore considers as particularly indefensible the existence or future establishment of bases in dependent territories which could be used for the maintenance of colonialism or for other purposes.

Noting with concern that foreign military bases are in practice a means of bringing pressure on nations and retarding their emancipation and development, based on their own ideological, political, economic and cultural ideas, the Conference declares its full support to the countries which are seeking to secure the evacuation of foreign bases on their territory and calls upon all States maintaining troops and bases in other countries to remove them forthwith.

The Conference considers that the maintenance at Guantanamo (Guba) of a military base of the United States of America, in defiance of the will of the Government and people of Cuba and in defiance of the provisions embodied in the Declaration of the Belgrade Conference, constitutes a violation of Cuba's sovercigaty and territorial integrity.

NAC-II/HEADS/5 Page 26

Noting that the Cuban Government expresses its readiness to settle its dispute over the base of Guantanamo with the United States on an equal footing, the Conference urges the United States Government to negotiate the evacuation of this base with the Cuban Government.

The Conference condemns the expressed intention of imperialist powers to establish bases in the Indian Ocean, as a calculated attempt to intimidate the emerging countries of Africa and Asia and an unwarranted extension of the policy of neo-colonialism and imperialism.

The Conference also recommends the elimination of the foreign bases in Cyprus and the Withdrawal of foreign troops from this country, except for those stationed there by virtue of United Nations resolutions.

While deploring the present internal hostilities against the legitimate government of Afghanisan and the atrocities inflicted upon the innocent people, they hoped that conditions for iolding free and fair elections could be restored as soon as possible, so that a permanent government which reflects the wishes and aspirations of the people and ensures political, conomic and social stability, can be formed. The Heads of State or Government called upon the international community to participate actively and generously in the reconstitution of Afghanistan and to increase humanitarian and financial aid for the speedy, voluntary and safe return of Afghan refugees to their homeland.

NEW CALEDONIA

- 9. The Heads of State or Government recognized that the South Pacific is one of the regions of the world that contains may of the remaining Non-Self-Governing Territories and reiterated the position they adopted at the Ninth Summit Conference concerning the inalienable right of the people of Nev Caledonia to self-determination in accordance with the United Nations Charter and Geneal Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 1541 (XV) of 15 December1960.
- 10. They noted the positive measures undertaken by the French authorities in cooperation with the local inhabitats to promote the political, economic and social development of the Territory in orde to lay the groundwork for the peaceful transition to independence, and were encouraged by the constructive activities undertaken by all parties involved, including the tireless effets and support of the South Pacific Forum for the realization of the independence of New Caledonia.
- 11. They further called on all parties involved to continue their efforts towards providing the necessary framework or the exercise of the right to self-determination and at the same time safeguarding the right of all New Caledonians.

MAYOTTE, MALAGASY ISLANDS AND CHAGOS ARCHIPELAGO

12. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed their full support for the sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of he Comoros over the islands of Mayotte and reiterated their solidarity with its people for the protection and preservation of the sovereignty, independence, unity and territorial integrity of their country. They noted the ongoing dialogue between the French Government and the Islamic Federal Republic of Comoros. In this context, they urged the Government of France to honour its commitments under the referendum held in the Archipelago on 22 December 1974. They further urged the colonial power to expedite the process of negotiations with a view to ensuring the reintegration of Mayotte into the Islamic Federal Republic of Comoros.

- 13. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed their support for the sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar over the Malagasy Islands of Glorieuses, Juan de Nova, Europa and Bassas Da India. They took note of the ongoing dialogue between France and the Malagasy authorities. They expressed their solidarity with the Government of the Republic of Madagascar in its efforts to preserve the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Malagasy Islands.
- 14. The Heads of State or Government reiterated their full support of the sovereignty of Mauritius over the Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, and called upon the former colonial power to return the Chagos Archipelago without delay.

INDIAN OCEAN

15. The Heads of State or Government reiterated the position taken at Summit Conferences and Ministerial meetings of the Non-Aligned Countries on the Declaration of the Indian Ocean as a Zone of Peace and the determination to continue their efforts to achieve the goals contained therein and as considered at the Meeting of Litoral and Hinterland States held in 1979. They noted that efforts by the Non-Aligned Countries and others to convene a conference on the Indian Ocean continue to be impeded, although important progress has been made in the Ad Hog Committee on the Indian Ocean. The recommendations of the Ad Hog Committee relating to the complex ramifications of the issues involved and differing perceptions on these issues as well as the Ad Hog Committee's future role should be addressed comprehensively by the 48th session of the UNGA (1993) with a view to convening, as early as possible thereafter, the conference in Colombo with the participation of the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council and the Major Maritime Users of the Indian Ocean.

Angola

168. They welcomed the positive advances made in the implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol, with a view to the restoration of peace and stability in Angola. They urged the Security Council to implement what has been agreed upon resolution 976 (1995), which provides for the dispatch of military components of UNAVEM III, since the conditions for their deployment are now propitious. They exhorted Member States to give a positive response to the call made by the Secretary-General to contribute to the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. They commended the resolution by the Angolan National Assembly to review the constitution with a view to granting to Mr. Jonas Savimbl, the UNITA's leader, one of the post of the vice-president of the Republic and called upon both parties to honour the compromise subscribed to by them in the Lusaka Protocol so that peace and stability can be instaured in Angola. They commended the Geneva Conference on Humanitarian Assistance to Angola and the Brussels Round Table on the National Programme for Community Rehabilitation and Reconciliation and called upon the international community to provide the pledged funds on a predictable and timely basis.

South Africa

169. The Heads of State or Government extended their heartfelt welcome and congratulations to South Africa on its return to the community of nations when it Joined the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries at the Ministerial Conference in Cairo in July 1994. They emphasized the fundamental role that the Movement played from the beginning of the struggle against the racist regime of South Africa. They paid a warm and special tribute to President Mandela for his untiring struggle and capacity to lead his people, and his country peacefully toward democracy under a Government of National Unity. They also commended the people of South Africa for their role in overcoming the legacy of apartheld and in the reconstruction of their nation under new non-racial and politically pluralist realities.

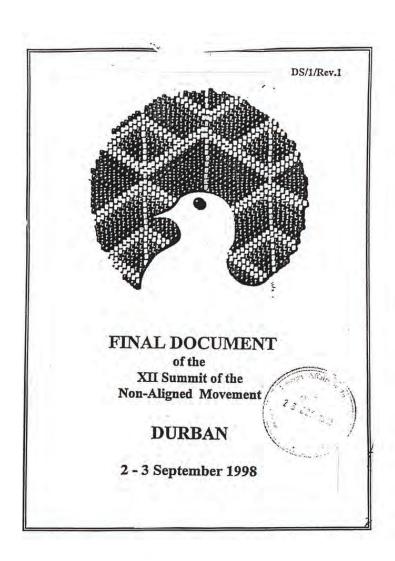

Mayotte

170. They reiterated the unquestionable sovereignty of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros over the Islamd of Mayotte, as well as the fulfillment of the commitments acquired prior to the referendum of 22 December 1974 regarding respect for the unity and territorial integrity of the Comirors. They urged the Government of France to accelerate the process of negotiations with a view to ensuring the effective and early return of the Island of Mayotte to the Comoros, in accordance with United Nations General Assembly resolution 49/18 of 6 December 1994, and other resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on this matter.

→ Chagos Archipelago

171. The Heads of State or Government relterated the support of the Non-Aligned Movement for the sovereignty of Mauritius over the Chagos Archipelago, including Diego García, and called on the former colonial power to pursue the dialogue with the Government of Mauritius for the early return of the Archipelago. In this respect, they noted with satisfaction the initiation of certain confidence-building measures by the two parties.

ANGOLA

- 224. The Heads of State or Government examined the situation prevailing in Angola in the framework of the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. They commended the Government of Angola for the flexibility and political will demonstrated, aiming at a long and lasting peace in that country.
- 225. The Heads of State or Government held the leadership of UNITA, and specifically Mr Jonas Savimbi, personally accountable for the resumption of hostilities and deteriorating security situation in Angola, as evidenced by their persistent refusal to conform to the relevant decisions of the United Nations Security Council, regarding the Implementation of the Military and Political Aspects of the Lusaka Protocol, particularly the demobilisation and disammament of its troops, as well as the extension of State administration. In this regard, they strongly condemned UNITA for its acts of armed aggression and re-occupation of the territory already handed over to the State Administration thus creating an unfortunate outflow of refugees to the neighbouring countries and displaced persons, and called once again on the Leaders of UNITA to undertake the total and unconditional demobilisation of their troops in accordance with the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol.
- 226. The Heads of State or Government appealed to the international community, in particular the United Nations Security Council to use all its power with a view to obliging UNITA to conform the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol. They also reiterated their appeal to the international community to increase the amount of humanitarian relief provided to the needy population as well as assistance for economic and social rehabilitation of Angola.

CHAGOS ARCHIPELAGO

227. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed that Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, is an integral part of the sovereign territory of the Republic of Mauritius. In this regard, they reiterated their call to the former colonial power to pursue constructive dialogue expeditiously with Mauritius for the early return of Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, to the sovereignty of the Republic of Mauritius.

184. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed that Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, is an integral part of the sovereign territory of the Republic of Mauritius. In this regard, they again called on the former colonial power to pursue constructive dialogue expeditiously with Mauritius for the early return of Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, to the sovereignty of the Republic of Mauritius.

Sudan

185. The Heads of State or Government welcomed the signing on 22 July 2002 of the Machakos Protocol between the Government of the Sudan and the Sudan Peoples' Liberation Movement, which represents a significant breakthrough on major issues and a major step towards the realization of a just and lasting peace in the Sudan. In connection with that signing, they paid tribute first of all to the parties, the ongoing efforts by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD), led by Kenya, as well as the efforts exerted by other facilitators including the IGAD Partners Forum (IPF) and appealed to the parties to continue to work for a successful conclusion of a comprehensive and lasting

186. Encouraged by those positive developments, the Heads of State or Government urged the international community to support efforts aimed at achieving peace in the Sudan. In this regard, they further urged the international community to provide assistance to meet the economic and developmental needs, including the reconstruction and rehabilitation of areas affected by the conflict, after the realization of peace in the Sudan.

Situation between Iraq and Kuwait

187. The Heads of State or Government welcomed the assurances given by the Republic of Iraq to respect the independence, sovereignty and security of the State of Kuwait and to ensure its territorial integrity within its internationally recognised border with a view to steer away from any action that might lead to a recurrence of the 1990 events. They called for the adoption of policies that would set the aforementioned guarantees in an operational framework of good intentions and good neighbourly relations. In this regard, the leaders stressed the significance of halting negative media campaigns and statements toward the creation of a favourable environment that would reassure the two countries of their commitment to the principles of good neighbourliness and non-interference in domestic affairs.

- 208 The Heads of State and Government called for a generous contribution to the ongoing humanitarian relief efforts, and urged the international community to support Lebanon on all levels to assist the Lebanese in facing the tremendous burden resulting from the human, social and economic tragedy, and in enhancing the Lebanese national economy.
- 209 The Heads of State and Government held Israel responsible for the loss of lives and suffering as well as the destruction of properties and infrastructure in Lebanon, and demanded Israel to compensate the Republic of Lebanon and its people for the losses sustained resulting from Israel's aggression in 2006.
- 210 The Heads of State and Government welcomed the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Republic of Lebanon and the Syrian Arab Republic in order to strengthen their brotherly relations.
- 211 The Heads of State and Government, pursuant to the failure of other means, emphasized the necessity of resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict based on relevant UN Resolutions leading to the establishment of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East as was called for by the Arab Peace Initiative of Beirut in 2002.

Africa

212 The Heads of State and Government welcomed the decisions by the thirteenth ordinary session of the Heads of State and Government of the Assembly of the African Union held from July 1-3, 2009 in Sirte, Libya and expressed their support for effective implementation of the decisions to promote peace, stability and socio-economic development in Africa

Chagos Archipelago

The Heads of State and Government reaffirmed that Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, is an integral part of the sovereign territory of the Republic of Mauritius. They noted that the former colonial power, the United Kingdom, and Mauritius held a first round of talks on the Chagos Archipelago issue in January 2009, and welcomed the initiative to pursue the dialogue through other rounds of talks. They called on the United Kingdom to expedite the process with a view to enable Mauritius to exercise its sovereignty over the Chagos Archipelago.

Lesotho

214 The Heads of State and Government, recalling the principles of the Movement on democracy, condemned the heinous attempt to assassinate the democratically elected Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Lesotho, Mr. Pakalitha Mosisili, on the 22nd April, 2009. And they

Chagos Archipelago

260. The Ministers reaffirmed that the Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, which was unlawfully excised by the former colonial power from the territory of Mauritius in violation of UN Resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2066 (XX) of 16 December 1965, forms an integral part of the territory of the Republic of Mauritius.

261. The Ministers further noted with grave concern that despite the strong opposition expressed by the Republic of Mauritius, the United Kingdom purported to establish a 'Marine Protected Area' around the Chagos Archipelago, further impeding the exercise of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Mauritius over the Chagos Archipelago in accordance with UN General Assembly resolution 2066(XX) as well as the right of return of Mauritian citizens who were forcibly removed from the Archipelago by the United Kingdom.

262. Cognizant that the Government of the Republic of Mauritius is committed to taking all appropriate measures to protect the legitimate rights of the Republic of Mauritius under international law with regard to its sovereignty and territorial integrity over the Chagos Archipelago, the Ministers resolved to fully support such measures including any action that may be taken in this regard at the United Nations General Assembly.

SHARM EL SHEIKH FINAL DOCUMENT 283. The Ministers supported the efforts of the Lebanese Government to save Lebanon from all threats to its security and stability, and expressed their understanding to the policy the Government pursues vis-a-vis the developments in the Arab region.

Africa

284. The Ministers acknowledged the decisions by the seventeenth ordinary session of the Heads of State and Government of the Assembly of the African Union held from 30 June – 1 July 2011 in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea, and expressed their support for effective implementation of the decisions to promote peace, stability and socio-economic development in Africa. The Ministers also acknowledged the decisions by the Eighteenth ordinary session of the Heads of State and Government of the Assembly of the African Union held from January 29 – 30, 2012 in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, which was convened under the theme "Boosting Intra-African Trade".

_ Chagos Archipelago

285. The Ministers reaffirmed that the Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia, which was unlawfully excised by the former colonial power from the territory of Mauritius in violation of international law and UN Resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2066 (XX) of 16 December 1965, forms an integral part of the territory of the Republic of Mauritius.

286. The Ministers further noted with grave concern that despite the strong opposition expressed by the Republic of Mauritius, the United Kingdom purported to establish a marine protected area around the Chagos Archipelago, further infringing upon the territorial integrity of the Republic of Mauritius and impeding the exercise of its sovereignty over the Chagos Archipelago as well as the exercise of the right of return of Mauritian citizens who were forcibly removed from the Archipelago by the United Kingdom.

287. Cognizant that the Government of the Republic of Mauritius is committed to taking all appropriate measures to affirm the territorial integrity of the Republic of Mauritius and its sovereignty over the Chagos Archipelago under international law, the Ministers resolved to fully support such measures including any action that may be taken in this regard at the United Nations General Assembly.

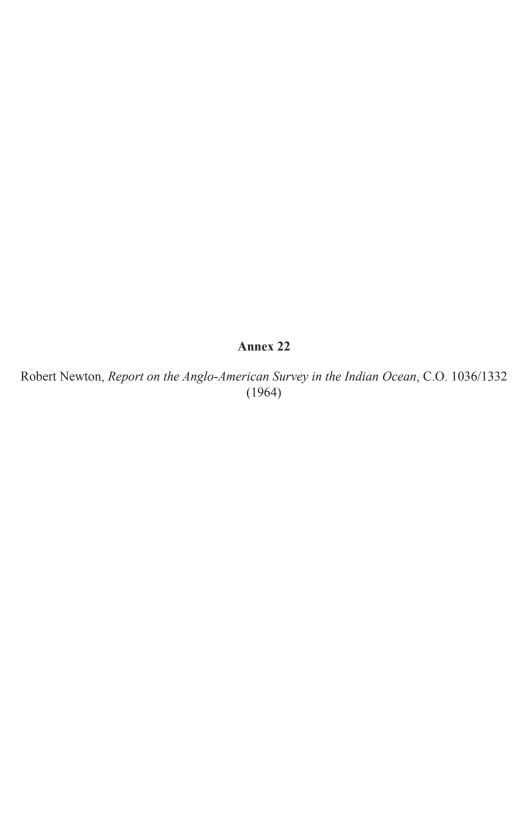

Libya

288. The Ministers expressed their support for the sovereignty, unity, independence and territorial integrity of Libya, and for the efforts made by Libya in cooperation with the United Nations in order to build a state based on the foundations of democracy, pluralism and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Somalia

289. The Ministers reaffirmed their respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of Somalia, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations.

290. The Ministers welcomed the positive political and security developments, and progress made in the Djibouti peace process, including the appointment of H.E. Abdiweli Mohamed Ali as the Prime Minister of the Transitional Federal Government (TFG) of Somalia and assured their commitment and support.

- 5. On each of the islands visited I had discussions with the Manager, my object not only being to obtain information about the demographic and economic position on the island but also to assess the extent to which the population, particularly in Diego Garcia, was a specificing community that had evolved to meet the conditions of each island, and therefore whether the versasfer of labour from one island to enother was a practical possibility. I class paid a short visit to the Egmont stell to form an impression whether the stell could be reinhabited. All the managers readily gave me the information I required to the best of their shifty though on some of the islands it was unfortunate that on account of the exigencies of DAMPIERS programme my visits were not as long as I should have liked. I do not, however, believe that curtailed visits have led to the commission of any important information or have affected the validity of impressions formed during the survey. My visit to Farquhar Island was necessitated by a signal from the Colonial Office to the offect that Mr. Peul Moulinis, Managing Director of Chagos Agalega Ltd. was on the island and, since it was unlikely that he would return to Mahé in time, it was suggested that I should visit him on Farquhar.
- 6. While on Mahe His Excellency the Governor kindly arranged for me to see Mr. André Delhocme, the owner of Coativy. I also had discussions with Mr. Joffrey, the seting Colonial Secretary, with the Attornsy-General and the acting Financial Secretary.
- Pinancial Scoretary.

 7. It was impossible to conceal the fact that the survey was a joint inglo-American operation. By the time we left Diego Carcia there was gossip to the effect that we had come to investigate the possibility of a base on the island. On Mahd, where DAMPIER remained for a short visit from the 17th-19th dugust, there were suggestions that it was intended to construct an American base for nuclear submarines in that part of the Indian Ocean. This suggestion was not taken exists by properly comers who have expressed concern over events in Zanathur and fear what, in their view, might bepon if there were a withdrawal of Partiah interest in the Indian Ocean. I took the line with island Managors that in a scientific ago there was a growing nood for accurate scientific surveys, oven in the Indian Ocean, and I made vague silusions to developments in radio communications. Since I had to make investigations into the possible cost of acquiring Diego Carcia and Costivy, and since R.A.F. surveys of Aldabra and Costivy were matters of common knowledge, I told Mr. Moulinié and Mr. Delhommo that we were investigating possibilities of developing air occuminations. Which might tales involve improved radio communications. Mr. Moulinié will cortainly be informed by his menagors that there were Americans in the party so I told him that we had American exports with us. The American wenders of the party behaved with admirable discretion and were kery out of sight during himpier's brief visit to Dlogo Sucre for refuelling. They were introduced to the islend Menagors as civilians but before the end of the survey work on Dlogo Gercia. The managors has the force the end of the survey work on Dlogo Gercia. I should also record that the manager of Diego Garcia paid a warm and well-deserved tribute to the behaviour of the shore parties from H.M.S. DAMPIER during ten days on the island. The manager himself gave willing essistence to the survey parties. H.M.S. DAMPIER and the immercan members of the expedition gave in return assistance in the form of repair work, supplies and entertainment.

9. On the 2nd September I submitted a draft report at the Colonial Office in order to give some advence indication of my recommendations.

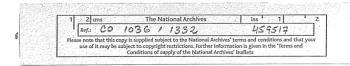

10. I now heve the honour to submit my final report. Broadly, my conclusions are as follows:-

- Thore should be no insurmountable obstacle to the removal, resettlement and re-employment of the civilian population of islands required for military purposes;
- (ii) Insofer as the islands have a distinctive social and economic life of their own, this life is Seychollois and not Mauritien;
- (iii) None of the islands, whether dependencies of Mauritius or of the Soychelles, is administered in the modern sense. All, including Aldabra, would benefit from closer administration from the Seychelles;
- (iv) The Oil Islands should be transferred to the Saychelles and the islands required for military purposes should become direct dependencies of the Crown. All the islands should be administered by a Commissioner responsible to the Governor of the Saychelles as High Commissioner. The opportunity should be taken to include in the duties of the former the administration of the main islands of the Saychelles group other than Mahé.
- 11. I have slso made recommendations regarding the price that might be effored for the acquisition of Costivy by the Crown. I have made suggestions, which are necessarily tentative, for the finencial basis of negotiations for the acquisition of Diago Gercia and Liabra. Allabra should not present any special problems other than the protection of the atell's unique wild life.
- 12. In conclusion I wish to record my gratitude for the kindness and hospitality of the Governor of the Soychelles and Ledy Orford, and for the trouble taken by Mr. Jeffrey, Acting Colonial Scentery of the Soychelles, and other officers of the Soychelles Government, in giving me information and advice. I am grateful for information supplied by the Governor of Mauritius. Introductory

- 1. The Anglo-American survey of Islands in the Indian Ocean was concerned with dependencies of the Governments of Mauritius and the Seyehelles. During the first part of the survey, from the 17th 31st July, investigations were conducted into conditions in the Chegos Archipelago particularly on the island of Diego Garcia which was regarded as the most promising for technical purposes. After discombarking some of the original survey party at Can, on the 2nd August, and submarking two sadditional British members, H.M.S. Dampier wisited the island of Agalega, a dependency of Mauritius, or Coetivy, Das Roches and Farquiar between the 3rd 15th August. The last three are dependencies of the Seychelles. All the islands are virtually in private ownership.
- 2. For the purpose of this report the islands were visited in order to determine the implications on the civilian population of strategic planning, and especially to assess the problems likely to arise out of the acquisition of the islands of Diego Carcia and Coethy for military purposes. The problem was prinarily one of the practicability of providing continued and congenial employment and of evaluating the sould and conomic consequences of moving island communities. It was also necessary to consider the future administration of the dependencies of Nauritius and, to some extunt, of all the smaller islands in the Indian Ocean now administred from Mahe or Nauritius.
- Following these investigations, including discussions in the Scychelles, certain broad conclusions have been reached. Those are:-
 - There should be no insurmountable obstacle to the removal, resottlement and re-employment of the civilian population of islands required for military purposes;
 - (ii) In so far as the islands have a distinctive social and economic life of their own, this life is Seychellois ar not Mauritian;
 - (iii) None of the islands, whether dependencies of Mauritius or of the Seychelles, is administered in the modern sense. All, including Aldabra, would benefit from closer administration from the Seycholles;
 - (iv) The Oil Islands now dependencies of Mauritius should be transferred to the Seychelles and the islands required for military purposes should become direct dependencies of the Crown. All the islands should be administered by a Commissioner responsible to the Governor of the Seychelles as High Commissioner. The opportunity should also be taken to include in the duties of the formor the administration of the main islands of the Seychelles group other than Mahe.
- 4. Recommendations have also been made regarding the price that might be offered for Coetivy, and more tentative suggestions made for the basis of negotiations for the acquisition of Diego Garcia, if these islands are required for military purpose. It is understood that the only slaunds alkely to have a strategic interest are Coetivy, Diego Garcia and Aldabra.
- 5. For the purposes of this report the islands forming the dependencies of Mauritius are collectively described as the Oil Islands, a convenient term in current use which prevents confusion with other dependencies of Mauritius such as the Saint Brandon Archipelage and Rodrigues.

PART I

The Oil Islands of Mauritius

6. In 1962 a company known as Chagos Agalega Ltd. was formed in Mahe to acquire the interests of the Mauritian companies which at that time owned the islands of the Chagos Archipelage and Agalega in the Indian Ocean. These islands, collectively known as the Oil Islands, are dependencies of Mauritius. They include:

(1) Diego Garcia

a narrow V-shaped island over 30 miles long from tip to tip, some Il square miles in area and with some 6,000 acres of cocount plantations. 1,374 miles from Mauritius; 1,010 miles from Mahe. Population: 172 Mauritians, 311 Seychellois.

(2) Peros Banhos

a large stell of 32 islands enclosing a lagoon of some 120 squere miles with administrative headquarters at IIe du Coin. 1,344, wiles from Marritius; 960 miles from Mahe. Population 251, all Mauritians except for about 30 Scychellois.

(3) Salamon

an atoll of ll islands totalling some 2,000 acres with administrative headquarters on Ile Boddam. 1,504 miles from Mauritius; 900 miles from Mahe. Population; 205 Hauritians; 14 Seychellois.

(4) Egmont or Six Islands

although at one time there were said to be seven islands in this group there are now indeed six. In recent years in this group there are now indeed six. In recent years latemake has become joined to South Bast island by a sand-Takemake has become joined to South Bast islands are below the control of the said of the s

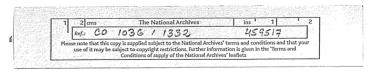

(5) Agalega

Agalega consists of two islands, North and South, joined by a sandbank about 1½ miles long which can be crossed on foot at low tide. North Island is seven miles long and between one and a miles wide. South Island is four miles long and three miles wide at the broadest part. The miles long and three miles wide at the broadest part. The wislands contain about 4,000 acres planted with occount. There are plant to increase the cocount plantations by at least 1,000 acres on North Island. Agalega lies within the cyclone belt and has at times suffered severe damage from storms. Anchorage facilities are poor. Agalega is about 360 miles from Hahe and 580 miles from Mauritius. Population 371, about 905 Scychollois.

7. In 1964 the composition of the population of the Oil Islands was as follows:-

(1) Diego Garcia

9. Ine exports from the Oil Islands are primarily copra and other eccount products. For this reason the way of life and economy of the inhabitants pertain to the Scycholles rather than to Mauritius. Copra exports are now at the following level:

11. By 1958 the Mauritian companies were in debt to the extent of Rs.1,774,873 and were experiencing great difficulty in obtaining further credit. They accordingly sought financial assistance from the Government of Nauritius. It was in consequence of this approach that Mr. Lucie Smith then Director of Agriculture in Mauritius, reported in 1959 on the account industry in the island. 13. The acquisition of any of the Oil Islands for military purposes, and changes in their administration, will almost certainly involve repercussions in the local politics of Mauritius and the Seychelles. Not everything that Mr. Moulinie said in the course of two days conversation should be accepted at its face value; but his plans and negotiations in the past two years will certainly be used for bergaining purposes. For this 'romson Mr. Moulinie's version of his negotiations and plans is set out in paragraphs 14-18 below. It is important to emphasise that there is no evidence that Changes Agaloga Lith. has yet ombarked on the capital expenditure required for the realisation of Mr. Moulinie's plans. It is by no means certain that the capital will be forthcoming. It is also probable that some of Mr. Moulinie's associates would be glad to accept a capital approciation and to be rid of a possibly embarrassing speculation.

Political and Commercial factors

Political and Commercial factors

14. Mr. Moulinio, a member of the Scychelles Legislative and Executive Councils, has recently been canvassing the possibility of administrative and economic union between the Scychelles and Meuritius. He sees in such a union the prospect of commercial profit for himself and his associates because he hopes that it would load to an increase in the carrying trade and passonger traffic between the islands which would justify the acquisition of a second motor vessel by the Colonial Steamsing Oc. to supplement the M.V. "Mauritius". This second ship would be available to carry to New Zealand the guane or rock phosphate oxtracted by Mr. Moulinic in St. Plorre and would enable extraction to be increased from about 5,500 tens to about 7,000 tens per annum. Further, Mr. Moulinich has in mind a scheme by which the Scychelles should obtain rice through Mauritius, thus providing cargoes. In return for this business Mauritius should provide Scychelles with 1,000 tens of sugar a year at the price paid by consumers in Mauritius plus freight at 2 cts. per 1b. Plans under-consideration include the encouragement of the tourist trade from Reunion, Madagascer, Mauritius and Scuth Africa by the construction of an air strip and a hotel in TLe Farquher. The development of Diego Garcia would form a major part of the plans for the development of the whole complex of islands. Diego Garcia would be rehabilitated, the population could be increased to about 4,000, and business with the island would spread the cost of more regular transport between the Oil Islands and the main island groups in the Indian Ocean. The plans depend on the communications and especially on an increased demand for passages and freight. passages and freight.

15. Schomes on these lines have been discussed recently between Mr. Mculinie, Mr. Paturcea (Ministor for Trade and Industry in Mcuritius, Mr. Neingerd (of Regers & Co.), Mr. Magagine (Minister for Education in Mcuritius) and with various other people in Mcuritius. and potentially vocal group in the Scychelles and in Mauritius have plans for commorcial development in both the Scychelles and Meuritius in which Diego Garcia is expected to play an important part. It has been suggested by Mr. Noulinic that Mr. Ringadoo sees in such plans an opportunity to Mr. Ringadoo's charactor, and in no vary imply criticism of him, if he more rigorously to follow up those suggestions. It is clear that Mr. Moulinie, and possibly his associates in Mauritius, had already by the time of the survey made up their minds to profit from any new interest in the area on the part of H.M.C.

16. There is no evidence that Mr. Moulinio's projects have received any influential support in the Seychelles or that the idea of closer union with Meuritius would be welcome in the ruling circles in Mane Proposals to improve trade and business contacts with Meuritius would be examined on their morits as a business proposition.

17. Mr. Moulinie himself made a careful inspection of all the islands in the Chagos Archipelago in Harch 1963. His conclusions are as follows:-

(a) Diego Garcia

(a) Diego Gercia

Vory badly neglected and mismanaged. Capable of producing 1,500 tons of copra within the next ten years and of reaching a peak of 3,000 tons a year. Labour should be retained at its peak of 3,000 tons a year. Labour should be retained at its present level for the time being but 10 good tractors are required. The islend should be divided into eight sections to ensure improved maintenance and supervision. The island contains about 250,000 tross of which shout 50% require complete rehabilitation at a cost of about Rs.200,000. 800 head of cettle could be maintenined on the cristing pasture and three times as many with the introduction of elephant grass. Some 60% of the island is suitable for mains cultivation which should be planted catensively pending replanting with occounts. In general the soil on Diego Gercia is about the bust seen on any coral island. The island could support a population of some $k_000 people. Its copra should be produced for the European market.

(b) Peros Banhos

A labour force of 80 is adequate for the whole stell if supervision is improved and good oversoors placed on the principal islands. Production from the atell should be at the rate of 850-900 tens of copra a year.

(c) Salamon

Improved cultivation methods and supervision should bring production to 225-250 tens of copra a year and ultimately to chout 400 tens. The slands could also grow maize as animal food and perhaps for the labourers. The labour force should be kept at the existing level.

(d) Egmont

The stell could produce rather more than 150 tens of copra a year. On one of the islands, Capallo, some 15,000-20,000 tens of guane could be extracted before the coconut plantations are rehabilitated.

(e) Three Brothers

Perhaps more than 40,000 tons of guano on this island of 20-30 acres.

(f) Eagle Island

Fifteen men under a good overseer could obtain 7-8 tens of opera per month. The cost of rehabilitating the sottlement to make it habitable would be about Rs.25,000. Nore than half this mount would be repaid from the fallen eccenuts.

18. Mr. Moulinie's report should not be accepted as an objective appraisal of economic prospects. No serious attempt has been made to estimate costs. It is essentially a prespectus designed to raise capital for a speculation. According to rowarks made on Mahe some at lease of the shareholders are concerned at the prospect of relatively heavy expenditure before they can expect an adequate return. No balance sheets have been published and no directors' meeting has been held for over a year. Mr. Moulinie himself claimed that Diego Carcia made a not profit of Rs. 90,000 in 1965, but this cannot at prosent be substantiated and in any case it is uncertain what return this represents on the capital employed.

19. Report by Dr. Octave Wiehe C.B.E.

Dr. Wiehe visited the islands in 1961. Estimates made on the basis of his report indicate that within five to twelve years the copra production could be increased to:

Agalega Diego Garcia Peros Banhos	1,400 550	tons	(638) (731) (180)
Salamon	350	12	(250)

The current production figures are given in brackets.

Defence Interest in Diego Garcia

20. Defence Interest in Diogo Carcia

Judging by the comments of the Service officers and technicians taking part in the survey the island is eminently suitable for the various purposes under consideration. These include the construction of an airstrip and its appurtenances covering an area of approximately 2½ miles; the construction of nearly storage tends and jetty requiring 41 acres; receiving and transmitting radio installations; recreational facilities, housing and administration. It would appear that the greater part of the area from Marianne to Eclipse Point will be required for the transmitter, airstrip and ancillary installations. The most suitable site for the receiver will be at, or near, South Point. A strip of land half a mile long from Observatory Point will be required for the storage tanks and jetty. The whole of the main settlement at East Point will be required for the storage tanks and for recreational facilities. If the impressions of the officers and technicians are confirmed, and if the necessary decisions are taken by the British and American Governments, the whole of Diago Carcia will be required for defence purposes. This will involve the eviction of the existing civilian population.

21. Implications of the acquisition of Diego Garcia for defence purposes Diego Garcia is still in the state described by Mr. Lucio-Smith when he visited the island in 1959. The het and humid climate, with an annual rainfall of 99", has created the luxuriant vegetation that is characteristic of that island clone among the occupied islands of the Chagos Archipelage. Bohind an almost continuous belt of Bods manice (Sewavela Trutescens) and Veloution (Cornefortia regented) there is a thick growth of coccunts pelms and forest trees, form, bushes, lianas and roting stups and debris. The area of clean occount plentations is small and even that compures unfavourably in appearance with the plantations on other islands. Mr. Lucie-Smith commented in paragraph 162 of his report that "the cultivations at Diogo are in so deplorable as state that there is hardly a normal palm in the entire island, while he whole matter is complicated by the massive infestation of the Bhinocures Beetle". In paragraph 165 Mr. Lucie-Smith referred to the possibility that Diogo carcia might be thought "a doubtful proposition in view of the bad condition of the occounts, the overgrown state of the island and the problematic control of the Rhinocores Bootle. His suggestion that occounts in the cil islands, especially in Diogo Carcia, represent a natural Socondary plant community rather than a cultivated plantation or or is strengthened by comparison with the demirable cultivation and flourishing appearance of the plantations on islands such as Parguhar or Dos Roches. Mr. Moulinie's impressions are much the same. Nevertheless, Mr. Lucie-Smith considered that with an expenditure of some Rs.5.1 million over ive years, batter methods of cultivation and Brow mechanisation the island could be made into a highly profitable concern. In general the conclusions of Mr. Lucie-Smith!

Mr. Moulinie and Dr. Octave Wiche coincide.

22. Diego Garcia is already making some progress as compared with conditions under the former owners. Experts of copra increased from 521 tens in 1962 to 677 tens in 1963. 430 tens were experted to the end of July and were expected, with every justification, of reaching ower 700 tens by the end of the year. The exploitation of guanch has ceased. Experts are now confined to copra and other occount products mainly to Mauritius. The copra is experted to the United Kingdom. coconut products,

23. Today on Diego Garcia an average of 8,000 cocomuts is required to produce a ton of copra, as compared with 8,500 in the past - though this is not necessarily a proof of improved cultivation. Sqmo of the younger pluntations were being properly manured. Young palms are beginning to be productive. There are plans for the introduction of cattle. The not profit in 1963 is said by Mr. Moulinie to have been some Rs.90,000 in contrast to a loss of Rs.55,827 in 1955-96 and Rs.196,596 in 1975-58, and to a small profit of Rs.5,868 in 1956-57. No figures have been made available to confirm or explain the alleged profit in 1965.

and to a small profit of Rs.5,668 in 1956-57. No figures have been made evailable to confirm or explain the alloged profit in 1953.

24. The total population of Diego Garcia in 1964 was 483, comprising 311 Seychellois and 172 Mauritius or Tlocis. In 1958 the population of the sisland was 589. In 1960 was 428. In 1963 it had fallen to 422. The dealine in 1954 was compared with 1958 was not due to any marked difference in the labour force. Nr. Lucie-Smith recorded a total of 216 mele labourers in 1958. In 1964 the total was 295. The present manager, Nr. Pouponneau compleined about the great difficulty in recruiting labour. He said that the neglected state of the island, especially the unkept bush area about Marianne and Eclipse Point, was due to lack of labour. In Mr. Noulinie's view what is required is more mechanisation and improved supervision. Labour in Piago Garcia is recruited from Mauritius and the Scychellos. All the Seychellois labourers are under contract, married mon for two years and bachelors for 18 months. 7 Mauritians were also under contract. It is noteworthy that in the better managed islands belonging to the Scychellos there were no serious complaints about the difficulty of obtaining labour from the Scychellos though there were suggestions, of very doubtful validity, that the American installations were attracting labour from the Scychellos though there were suggestions, of very doubtful validity, that the American installations were attracting and from had management. Nr. Moulinic complained of the ochogolar, and from had management. Mr. Moulinic complained of the ochogolar, and from had management. Mr. Moulinic complained of the ochogolar, and from had management. Mr. Moulinic complained of the ochogolar, and from had management. Mr. Moulinic complained of the ochogolar directed against his company which was said to be impeding recruitment in Mauritius of the sislend some of the islands. They are said to be "more diliquent in supplementing their basic retions and their cash resources than the preserved."

25. Sir Robert Scott's visits took pices nearly ten years ago. It is alrusdy apparent that already little is left of the distinctive life of Diego Gercie which he described. Judging by conversations with the menager, and with others on the island, most of the inhabitants of Diego Gercia would gladly work claswhere if given the opportunity. The doctor on Dampior, Surgeon-Lieutenant Maclean, who spoke French well and spent ton days on the island, endoared these comments on Sir Robert Scott's observations. At the time of the survey there was little evidence of any real sense of a distinct community evolved by the special local environment. Since four-fiftle of the labour force are Seychollois under 2-year or 16-month contracts, the evocation of a distinctive attitude to life from the appearance of a chance-most individual on Diego Gercia is hacardous. Difficulties in establishing the peternity of some children was a further indication of a locas social structure - since it could not be attributed to the evolution of a matriarchal society. There are grounds for the conclusion that life on Diego Gercia evolved to meet the special conditions of the 19th contury and that attachment to the island in recent years was fostered by the cary-going ways of the old company rather than to the island itself. The impact of the new company has locaseed the old ties, and if there is a distinctive way of life on the islands it is Scychollois rather than the Maritian being African in origin and evolved round the coconut palm.

25. Of the total population of Diego Gerein, perhaps 42 men and 38 wessen, with 15% children, might be accepted as Ileais. According to the samager 22 men and 29 wessen made relatively frequent visits to relatives in Equities and perhaps no more than 3 men and 17 wessen including a wessen of 62 the hal never left biggo Gerein, could really be regarded as having their permanent homes on the island. The problem of the Ileais and the extent to which they form a distinct community is one of some sublicty and is not within the grasp of the present manager of Diego Gardin. But it may be accepted as a basis for further planning that if it becomes necessary to trensfer the whole population there will be no problem reschiling, for instance, the Hebridean evictions. Alternative employment on a new demicile under suitable conditions elsewhere should be acceptable.

27. Wages for the ordinary labourer on Diego Garcia amounted to Rs.6.0 per month and weaken received Rs.10.50. Bonuses amount to Rs.6.0 per north and Rs.2 per month in addition are peid to nevely engaged Mauritians in lieu of the customary issue of beuillon. A day's work is based on an allotted task which can be completed between 10.0 a.m. -11.0 a.m.

28. The costs of acquisition

28. The costs of acquisition

It has not been possible to produce informed estimates because the busis of estimates has been either the conditions of bankruptcy revealed by Mr. Lucio-Saith or Mr. Moulinie's plans. In the Seychellos the acquisition of a coconut estate is based on the 10 years purchase of the not profit plus the purchase on valuation of installations and building and compensation for young trees not in bearing. Compulsory acquisition also involves compensation for loss of development potential. Diego Garcia was bought as a speculation from a bankrupt company that had lost interest in the oil islands. It was acquired by Chagos Agalega itd. very cheaply. The islands 'recent financial history has been a story of losses and its development potential has still to be proved. Mr. Moulinio repeatedly emphasised in conversation that in his view Diego Garcia was the key to the economic development of Chagos. The other islands, especially acalega, which lies in the cycles one, are said to be regarded by new company as marginal. Plans for the development of the Oil Islands by Chagos Agalega itd. depend primarily on Diego Garcia which according to Nr. Lucie-Sainth, could achieve an annual production of some 3,400 tens of copra and according to Mr. Moulinie might provide a livelihood for a population of 4,000.

29. To attempt to frame a rough estimate of the cost of the acquisition of Plago Garcia in the present circumstances therefore involves a valuation of what was recontly a bankrupt concern with a potential value depending almost wholly on still hypothetical circumstances and on relatively large emptted expenditure. Two years effect the Change Agalega Co. acquired the island there are few signs of improvement as compared with the conditions described by Hr. Lucio-Ganth, though there are some. Moreover in Nr. Moulinie's mind the full exploitation of the island is part of a comprehensive plan for the economic development of the Oil Islands and other islands in the Indian Ocean, this development envisages the construction of an air strip and a hotel on Frequier Island. Some form of union between Nauritius and the Sepokelles, and the enlistenont of interest on the part of Mauritius and the Sepokelles, and the enlistenont of interest on the part of Mauritius and the Sepokelles, and the chief the order of the oreal order of the order of the order of the order of the order of

30. Hr. Moulinis himself gave no indication of any willingness to suggest a possible basis for negotiation. He will undeubtedly consult Kr. Maingard as soon as possible and he will certainly attempt to derive full advantage from H.K.C.'s interest in the island. The company's accounts are not available. In those circumstances it seems that an offer from a potential purchaser must be forthcoming before any progress is made. The price of eccount lend in the Seychelles veries between Rs.1,000 and Rs.500 an acre according to its situation and accessibility. Accepting 6,000 acres as the area under eccents in Diego Garcia an after of Rs.500 an acre would amount to Rs.3,000,000 or $225,000.

31. Any such offer would be generous. If Diego areia were to export 800 tons of copre annually at an average price of £65 a ton and allowing 7% as representing fair costs of production, ten years purchase of the profit would be of the order of £156,000. Mr. Moulinia has estimated that the number of eccount palms on Diego Gercia might amount to 250,000 trees of which 2½ might be young trees or 6,250. Many of these trees may never be productive on account of bad planting, disease and pests. A purchase price of Rs.3,000,000 would in practice represent a very adequate offer to include young trees, buildings and loss of development will be undertaken in the next few months. It would be optimistic to assume that Diego Gercia is likely to produce 1,000 tons of copra a year in the near future despite Mr. Houlinie's estimate that "Diego could easily bounce to the 1,500 tons per year within the next ten years." A purchase price on the basis of Rs.500 per cere should be regarded as in fact covering the full value of the island including compensation for young trees, buildings and development potential.

32. Mr. Moulinio and his associates, however, are in the position of owning property which, in the eyes of the purchasor, might be regarded as having unique adventages. To acquire the property under the Land Acquisition Ordinance of Mauritius would involve the consent of Mauritian Ministers which would not necessarily be forthcoming, capocially if it were represented to them that Nauritius was being deprived of opportunities for improved trade and employment. It is very possible that Mr. Moulinic has over-emphasized the interests of Mauritius in his plans, perhaps to assist him to drive a bergain; but the correspondence he has conducted during the past for months strongly suggests that it would be prudent to foresee the possibility of opposition organised specifically in order to extract better terms or subsidiary advantages. The Governor of Mauritius will be in a position to advise on this point.

33. Re-omployment and resettlement of the Labour Force

Acquisition of Piego Garcia for defence purposes will imply the displacement of the whole of the existing population of the island. If the administrative and meteorological staff are disregarded the numbers involved will be approximately

			02.72.2	Total

1. It is assumed that neither the Government of Mauritius nor the Government of the Sychelles should be put to additional expenditure by reason of defence plens in the Indian Ocean which might result in less of rovenue, unemployment or relatively expensive resortlement. Employment for the existing population of Diego Gerein in other islands is a practical possibility, especially if there is more intensive and more diversified development. Further employment, though not needsarily for the existing population, will also be provided if labour from Mauritius and the Scychelles is employed on constructional work. Suggestions were made by members of the survey team that it might be necessary to employ Pakistanis, as on Gan. This recourse should be a last resort if the employment of Mauritians and Seychelleis proves impracticable, and then only after adequate explanations. There is, however, no reason in principle why the bulk of the labour force from Diego Garcia should not be employed on other islands.

from Diogo Carcia should not be employed on other islands.

55. H.M.C. should therefore accept in principle responsibility for facilitating re-employment of the Neuritims and Seychellois on other islands and for the re-sottlement in Meuritims and the Seychellos of those unralling or unable to accept re-employment. Sottlement schemes would have the additional advantage of retaining the Disgo Garcian labourers as a commantly subject to supervision and guidance. Very few are wholly ignorant of life in the main islands and the conditions of the Black River area of Meuritius might woll be suitable for dispossessed llevis. Even so, some guidance will be required. The cost will be relatively heavy. In the Seychelles, where it is considered that land settlement should be based on 5-cere plots, the capital cost of the acquisition of land the provision of access and services might measure to Rs.2,000 an acro. The resettlement of the adult Seychellois from Diago García might therefore cost something of the order of from Diago García might therefore cost something of the order of Rs.1,500,000 for lead to settle about 150 households and perhaps.

Rs.3,500,000 for housing at Rs.2,000 per house, some £155,000 in all. The resettlement of Meuritians would airvolve made smaller numbers, say 50 families; but costs per head would be higher. It would be wise for planning purposes, and subject to the provision of detailed estimates, for planning purposes, and subject to the provision of detailed estimates was would of course be substantially reduced if alternative employment on the other islands can be provided.

36. Resettlement of Neuritians would in the Chages Archipelage and on on the other islamus can so provided.

36. Resettlement on other islands in the Chagos Archipelage and on Agalega will require further actailed investigation on the spot before the problem can be usefully discussed. Mr. Moulinis has plans for the problem can be usefully discussed. Wr. Moulinis has plans for under contract. As far as the Soychellois are concerned there is no under contract. As far as the Soychellois are concerned there is no reason why they should not accept work either in the islands owned by the Chagos Agalega tid. or elsewhere on islands controlled by the Chagos Agalega tid. or elsewhere on islands controlled by Wr. Moulinio. A handful of Ileeds might be reluctant to move - this will have to be determined by a detailed survey - but might well accept transport to, and houses on, other islands if they do not wish to return to Mouritius. Mr. Moulinio's plans for the other islands could provide work for all.

37. Those of the dispossorsed labourers who are boyond working againfuld be paid a pension. The present rate in Mauritius is Rs.22 a month. There is no old age pension in the Scychelles.

38. An island about 6 miles long and ly miles wide under the administration of the Seychelles. It is owned by Mr. Andre Delhomme, of Mahe. The island is almost entirely planted with eccents. Costiny has been surveyed by the R.A.F. The island comprises some 2,000 acres of account plantations. Its yield over the past ten years is as follows:-

Year	Average price f.o.b.	Tons
1954 1955 1956 1957 1958 1959 1960 1961 1962 1963	274 £60 £62 £61 £65 £88 £71 £60 £59	 319.136 325.416 312.515 295.886 300.657 304.265 328.388 295.216 268.749 277.564

Costs of acquisition

39. Mr. Andre Delhomme has had in mind for some time the possibility of selling the island, particularly after the R.A.F. survey. Mr. Delhom like others in the Seychelles, is worried by the recent developments in Zansibar. He fears that H.M.G. has no serious interest in the future of the Scychelles and he would welcome the assurance to be derived from the British or allied activity in this part of the Indian Ocean. In April 1964 Mr. Delhomme suggested negotiations on the lines that:-

- If Costivy were to become an R.A.F. Base he would not seek compensation for the necessary felling of coconut palms; (1)
- (2) He himself should remain the owner of the island which should be loased to the government, either to the Government of the Seychellos or to H.M.G. in Lendon for 30-50 years at a ront based on the local value of 150 tons of copra, after deduction of export duty, and providing that the rent is also free of income tax.

.Mr. Delhoume suggested that the exemption from Income Tax would represent the equivalent componsation for componsation normally paid for the falling of occount palms. He pointed out that such compensation is exempt from Income Tax.

40. Exemption from Income Tax in the menner proposed is clearly undesirable in principle and would be unsatisfactory in practice. This was indicated to Mr. Delhomme at a discussion in Nahe on the 18th August. At this discussion, however, Mr. Delhomse expressed his willingness to sell the island. It also emerged in due course, that he would accept a price of Rs.2,5000,000 or £167,500.

Al. The average net prefit of Cootivy during the past five years amounts to Rs.145,000 per annum, an income representing a return of 6% on a capital of Rs.2,500,000. These figures are supported by the balance shoets for the past five years which have been checked by the Income Tex authorities in the Squehelles for the purpose of this report and which may be summarised as follows:

Good coconut land such as exists at Coctivy would fetch Rs.2,000 an core in Maho. But Coctivy is 160 miles from Maho. The price proposed amounts to Rs.1,250 cm acre for 2,000 acres comprising coconut plant-stion in excellent condition. It appears reasonable in full the circumstances. It is therefore recommended that if it is decided to proceed with defence plans on the island negotiations should begin with no offer of Rs.2,500,000. The Seychelles Government at present derives Rs.11,138 a year from Coctivy in the form of % export duty.

Financial

45. Aldabra does not present any serious financial problems in so far as this inquiry is concerned. The island was not visited by H.M.S. Dampior during the Anglo-American survey. Aldabra is leased by the Government of the Seychelles for a term of thirty years renewable at the option of the leases at a rent of Rs.6,666.67 p.s. The agreement requires South Island to be reteined as a nature reserve. According to Clause 21 of the agreement the lessor has a right to secure possession if the islands are required for a public purpose. Public purpose includes Admiralty and W.D. requirements.

Nature conservancy

- Nature conservancy

 46. It is unfortunate that Aldebra, as Darwin once pointed out, is the last refuge of the gaset-turilos of the Indian Ocean which elsewhere have been exterminated in accordance with man's customary methods of exploitation. In this respect the island is unique. The ornithology of the island is sulso of considerable interest, particularly in view of the chundance of the Secred This (Threskiornis acthiopica) and the presence of the Flamingo (Pheenicoptous ruber). According to the Satishonian Institutes "Preliminary Field Guide to the Birds of the Indian Ocean (Washington, 1965)" some species of birds on the islands still rotain a primitive tameness which would hendicap their survival if the islands were developed on modern lines. It is not intended to imply that the conservation of unique feams should outwoigh essential strategic requirements, still less that the R.A.F. would not take an enlightness view of the recommission of local fauna. If adequate precautions are taken, the use of the stoll for military purposes would facilitate the enforcement of preservation measures attempted or contemplated by the Seychallos Government, including the effective preservation of the green turtle.

 L. Adequate nature conservance on Aldebra requires a detailed
- 47. Adequate nature conservancy on Aldebra requires a detailed study of found and avifaume, especially the ecology of the tortoises. It will also require rigid measures against the introduction of dogs, cats and rats on the lines adopted recently for St. Kilda. It is importaive that these measures are taken before large-scale constructional works are begun and that they should be based on a detailed ecological study. The Director Ceneral of the Nature Conservancy Trust might be consulted.

PART IV

Administrative

The administrative future of the Islands

48. The following proposals for the administrative future of the islands are based on the assumption that it is essential to remove them from the unpredictable course of politics that tends to follow independence. The islands should therefore become direct dependencies of the British Crown. Similar action has been taken by the French in the off shore islands of Madagasear, Chorieuse, Tromalin and Juan de $h_{\rm mag}$ which, it appears, are now the property of Metropolitan France.

it appears, are now the property of Metropolitan Franco. We which,

49. Until recently the Oil Islands of Muuritius have been of little interest to Mauritims except to the commercial companies who were so unsuccessfully exploiting them. This lack of interest me apparent at the time of the examination of the problem undertaken in Mauritius scone five years ago. Oodstions in Mauritius have obviously changed a great deal in recent years. It appears, as explained in paragraphs 14-15 of this report, that some Ministers and business men in Mauritius are beginning to regard the Oil Islands as potentially valueble assets. Hence there is a risk that to reason the islands from the jurisdiction of Mauritius would give rise to considerable political difficulties. The issue is primarily one of reletive adventages and disadventages in regard to long-term strategy and is not a matter that can be examined in this report. It can be summerised in the question, how for adverse, but doubtless temporary, reactions in Mauritius should outweigh the need for security of tenure in certain of the islands, or at least in Diego Gracia. A further issue is the assessment of the extent to which Mauritius might enterpras M.M.G. is existing interests in the island before they can be replaced. Stated thus, the problem may appear over-simplified. The final decision connot be independent of any obligations or commitment that H.M.G. might have towards Mauritius arising out of past history or any beneficial interest of Mauritius in the Oil Islands.

51. These islands came under the British Crown in 1810 after the conquest of Mauritius. As Sir Robert Scott has pointed out, "it is doubtful whether the French governors had a very clear notion of the number and stuations of the islands for which they were assumed to be responsible". Since 1810 the 0il Islands have been administered, more or less, by Mauritius. The Scychelles and the Amirentes group became a separate colony by Istters Patent in 1905. Coetivy and the Excuher islands were added to the Seychelles by Letters Patent in 1908 and 1921 respectively.

52. The administrative connection of the islands with Mauritius is tenuous. The replies to questions in the Mauritius legislature on the 19th May and 2nd June, 1964, indicate that knowledge of the islands is fregmentary and that effective governmental contact does not exist. Governors visit them from time to time whosever a frigate has been evaileble. Magistrates from Mauritius make visits of inspection about once a year in accordance with the Course Ordinance of 1945. It is their duty to ensure that the prescribed conditions of employment are observed, to enquire into grieveness and generally to ensure that the islands are properly administered. Technical officers pay infrequent visits. The Government of Meuritius maintains metocological stations in Diego Garcia and Agelege, both of which are in the cyclone zone, and also provides school-terchors, midwives and dispensors on the menin islands of each group. Administration in any practical sense is confined to the paternal responsibility of the menager of each island. In general it is adequate for the needs of the islands though too much depends on the personality of each menager. Sir Robert Scott commonts that "the general vall-being of the communities derives from their own menses of order and acquaity to produce and from the ability of their managements to keep them woulded together". This comment auggosts that the island communities have not yet successfully evolved their own way of life and self-discipline. It is indeed the ability of the menagement that is the producinant factor in establishing an ordered life and it is probably some lack of manageric belief that is the cause of such of the pelphelle malies in Diego Geroic today.

18 the cause of "uch of the pelpeble meleise in Diego Gercia today.

53. The isle as are in fact estetes organised and administered on much the same principles as were, for example, the German plantations in the Camoroons same thirty years ago. The essential difference between the Oil Islands and the German plantations of thirty years ago is that the former are so inaccessible to the supervisory administration. Apart from the occasional vimit of a wearship their contacts with Mauritius are confined to the visits of the M.V. "Mauritius" about twice a year. The schooner "Lo Perlo", which used to form snother link betwoen Mauritius and its dependencies, is now Seychelles ewond and calls, under the name of "Iele of Farquher", perhaps once every two end a half monthe. The only regular link between the islands was the motor vessel "Sir Jules" which was sold because it was too expensive to maintain, an indication that effective control on the isl and by means of regular visits is not yet a commercial proposition.

54. The direct interests of Mauritius in the Oil Islands are confined to the livelihood they provide for some 683 Mauritians, mon and women and childron. They are a source of business and profit to a Mauritian company - the Colonial Stemmship Co. They provide some occount palm products for the Mauritian consumers. They are also essential points in the weather reporting system in the Indian Ocean. Their reports are of crucial value in warning Mauritius of the formation and course of cyclones. The islands have not hitherto been a factor in Mauritian politics and until recordly no Mauritian has expressed any interest in them. For Mauritians welcome posting to the islands and there is only one Indian among the Mauritian poulation, the respected and devoted Mr. Suleiman, dispenser on Diego Garcia.

- 55. Such Mauritian interests in, and connections with, the Oil Islands as exist are no conclusive reason for the retention of Mauritian administration, especially if it could be gurrenteed that the islands would provide a source of employment and sumply for Mauritians to the same extent so obtains to-dey; and provided that the maintenance of the meteorological stations are ensured.
- 56. The islands ore at present being drawn more closely into the the Seychelles sphere of influence. Only one of the Managers is not a Seychellois. Lebour is being brought increasingly from the Seychellois, portly because it is said that Marritans do not now wish to work on the islands. If this objection exists it is perhaps due in part to dislike of the new company. It is also probable that the ementices of life in Mauritans, with its cinemas and shops, exercise a powerful attractive force out of short 505 mels labourers in the Oil Islands some 325 are Seychellois and 180 are Mauritans.
- 57. The pull of the Saycholles is likely to continue with the advent of Chegos-Agalogo Ltd. Mr. Moulinis has stated his intention of recruiting 800 additional Saychellois, partly for new development work and partly to replace Meuritian labour. Mr. Moulinis himself has pointed out that at least 50% of the 011 Islands copra is not up to the Saychellos cuclify. He took the initiative in recommending that to encourage improvement and development, the export duty on copra sent through Habs should be waived for five years and then should be subject to a maximum of 3% instead of 5%. Recently the duty has been reduced to 5% for the outer islands, including Cocityy. For these reasons, and until recently, Mr. Moulimis has urged that the Saychelles should administer the Oil Islands of Mauritius.
- the Seyonelles should examinater the Oul Islands of Meuritius.

 58. The way of life on the Oil Islands and the concemy on which that way of life is based are certainly Seychellois rether than Meuritian. For this reason, and because the Seychelles understend coconuts as Meuritius understands sugar, though perhaps not to the same degree of Meuritius understands sugar, though perhaps not to the same degree of the inlands to the Seychelles. The features of island life complexised by Sir Robert Scott are primarily Seychellois, judging by conditions on the other islands to which the Seychellos (overnment is responsible. Sir Robert Scott are primarily Seychellois, judging by conditions on the other islands which a responsible. In the seychellos can be presented, by reason of which a rhythm of life proper to a past age has persisted, by reason of their renoteness and lack of incentive to change is as applicable to the Seychellos as to Diego Garcia or Agalega. There is nothing in the Garcia or Agalega. There is nothing in the Farquiar Island, Des Roches and Agalega, are one world with the Seychelles.
- 59. If the Oil Islands were transferred to the Seychelies the transfer could be justified by the greater security given to any defence interests established there and because it would be a transfer of like to like. Personalities and politics in Mauritius do not offer a firm basis for strategic planning. It does not now appear that the Saychelles are likely to be as immume to change and to unpredictable policies as has biothorto been assumed. This commont is not intended to attach undue weight to the views and force of property owners upact by the fatto of Zanzibar. But if there is constitutional advance in the Saychelles, and if direct British control is relaxed, it would be idle to pretend that stability in the islands can be assumed.

Administrative Recommendations

60. It is therefore recommended that the Oil Islands should become direct dependencies of the British Crown and administered under the authority of the Governor of the Saychelles as High Commissioner. The opportunity should be taken to arrenge for the closer administration of the smaller island dependencies of the Saychelles in the Amirentes and elsewhere.

61. If Diego Gercia, Cootivy and Aldabra are required for military purposes the two former will have no problems of civilian administration other than the recruitment and employment of labour as at Can. Aldabra is a large stell where only one islend would be required by the R.A.F. and there would be much advantage of an opportunity to make effective the attempts of the Saychellos "overnment to preserve wild life, including the Groon Turtles as well as the tortoises. Both the Governments of Mauritius and the Saychellos will in any case retain an interest in Irbour recruited from the islands and must be satisfied that the terms of employment are properly observed. This should be one of the duties of the future administration of the islands.

62. The administration of the Oil Islands of Equitius that is the Chagos Archipolage and Agalaga, should be combined with that of the outlying islands of the Scycholles. It also appears that Preslin and Le Digus in the main Scycholles Group require closer supervision. If an officer were appointed as Commissioner for the Crown's possessions in the Indian Ocean, Chagos, Aldebra, and Coctivy, he should be attioned at Islah and in return for suitable information from the Scycholles he should also hold the port of Civil Commissioner for the outlying islands in addition to being Commissioner of the Orown Islands. Transport could be based on existing manns, by schoolner and the Mr. Munritius, and on R.M.F. atcreaft Commercial schooler; communications are highly uncortain and slow. There is abundent need in this part of the Indian Ocean for a modern schooner-type vessel to be used for transport of a High Commissioner based on Mahd, as well as for the various technical emigrate of the Mr. Sacha a vessel could be used for fisheries central and research and night also be chartered from time to time by private individuals or firms.

63. If administrative proposals on these lines are not adopted Aldabra, Diego Garcia and Costivy would have to be administered by a Service Officer in much the same manner as is Gan. The remaining islands would have to be placed directly under the Governor of the Seychelles, as Governor, to be administered or left alone in much the same manner as the Amirentes and Farquher islands are treated to-day.

64. The Scychellos will in any case require relatively substantial assistance from H.M.G. before they can be regarded as having an occnomic base, however, insubstantial, for further economic advance and some degree of autonomy. Their isolation and the uncertainty of air communications are not only seriously limiting factors but are a reproach in an age when air transport has become the normal means of transport in the interior of Australia or the Far North of Canada. As a subsidiary issue further consideration should be given to the possibility of an air link between Mahe and Costiny by commercial air lines to enable tourists to reach the Saychelles.

2 cms			National Are		70 HW11	ins	1	2502

65. The foregoing paragraphs are primarily concerned with the Seychelles connection and are perhaps liable to the criticism that insufficient attention has been paid to the position of Mauritius. Judging by the history of the Nauritian companies in recent years the islands have not been a source of profit to Mauritius. They have also provided more or less unwilling exile for a few Mauritian officers. They have offored livelihood to some Mauritians who might otherwise have been unemployed or under-employed in Mauritius.

Constitutional issues

Constitutional issues

66. According to precedents, if these are still valid, the transfer of the islands from Mauritius to the Seychelles will require the assent of Mauritian Kinisters. In 1906, after some three years of correspondence between Kr. Joseph Chemberlain and the Governor of Mauritius, Lord Elgin enquired whether any serious opposition was to be anticipated if the proposal for the transfer of C-etiry were placed before the Council of Government. Only if Sir Charles Boyle was of the opinion that the Council would receive the suggestion of transfer favourably, or at least without any strong opposition, would the Secretary of State give further consideration to the matter. In 1921 Sir Resketh Bell reported that the Council of Government had recommended that "the Farquhar Islands should be transferred to, and from part of the Seychelles." The Letters Patent of 13th January 1908 expressly cited the fact that the Council of . Government of Mauritius had by resolution recommended the transfer of the island of Costivy. The Letters Patent of the 2nd December 1921 made a similar reference when the Farquhar Atoll was transferred to had a similar reference when the Farquhar Moull was transferred to had a similar preference when the Mauritian Ministers should be formally consulted. These, of course, are problems requiring legal advice and the views of the Governor of Mauritium. They are mentioned merely as an indication of some of the subsidiary problems which the proposal to transfer the islands will inevitably entail.

Compensation for Mauritius

67. In any event it would scarcely be politic to de rive Maur tius of its dependencies without some guid pro guo. In strict terms of compensation it is doubtful whether it would be possible to base any case for Mauritius on the grounds of loss. H.M.G. should assume responsibility for Mauritians evicted from the islands and likely to lose their traditional livelihood. The cost of transfer to other lose their traditional livelihood in the cost of transfer to other slands and of the construction of houses should be borne by H.M.G. as part of the disturbance element in compensation due to the Company. Otherwise the cost of resttlement in Mauritius should be met. Paymonts of this nature however, are obligations towards private persons rather than to the Government of Mauritius.

/Since

Since the Mauritian objections to the transfer may be based on tha loss of some economic potential, H.M.O. might well offer a contribution towards capital works is likely to be of occurrencial value to Mauritius; for example, the perment of a ceptial sum towards the improvement of labour fecilities at Port Louis on the improvement of Plaisance Airport. Any such perment should be entirely ex gratia.

Meteoroglogical Services

68. The continued existence of meteorological services on Diego Garcia and Agalega will be essential for Meuritius and for the Masserrer islands generally. It is to be assumed that such services will be retained on Diego Garcia by the British or U.S. authorities. If no there must be a firm undertaking to continue weather reports to Mauritius on at least the present basis. The Government of Mauritius should also be reimbursed the full cepital cost of its station on Diego Garcia if this is replaced by British or U.S. government.installations.

69. There would appear to be no reason why the Mauritius Government should not rotain strff and oquipment on Agalega even if that island were transferred to the Saycholles. It is possible that it may be necessary for H.M.G. or the Government of the Saycholles to provide transport for strff in the event of sea communications between Agalega and Port Louis becoming even more tenuous than is the case at present.

PART VI

Summary

73. This report, while attempting to set out the various problems which the execution of the schemes now under consideration will involve, cannot protend to attempt any detailed estimate of the costs. The cost of acquiring Diego Garcia certainly cannot be estimated since it depends on the extent to which the owners of the island can use the bargaining strength of their position. Further, the indirect costs, in the form of resottlement and pensions, the costs of future administration and of direct or indirect compensation to Hauritius and the Seychelles can be accurately assessed only after negotiations and discussions with the governments and individuals concerned have been directed specifically to these objectives.

- It is clear that expenditure must envisage for planning purposes:
- the direct cost of acquisition;
- (2) resettlement of dispossessed labour unable or unwilling to find work in other islands;
- (3) pensions for islanders beyond active work;
- (4) reimbursement to the Seychelles of revenue lost in copra export duty;
- (5) the cost of an ex gratic grant to Hauritius in the fora of a development grant in return for the transfer of the Oil Islands;
- (6) the salary and allowances of a Commissioner of the Islands and the provision of the necessary transport;
- (?) the reimbursement to the Government of Mauritius of capital expenditure in installing a meteorological station on Diego Garcia and perhaps on Agalega.

If offers of Rs.2,500,000 for Coetivy and Rs.3,000,000 for Diego García were accepted the cost of the acquisition of the two islands would amount to $472,500. Resettlement costs, subject to detailed estimates, should not cost more than $200,000. Pensions should not exceed $1,000 a year initially. The figures suggested for resettlement and pensions are generous.

74. Resettlement schemes on the scale indicated may not be necessary since there should be no obstacle in principle to the transfer of labour from Diago Garcia and Coetivy to other islands. Chagos Agalega Ltd. have under consideration plans for the development of Segment, Three Brothers and Eagle Island. According to the manager of Agalega it is at present planned to increase the labour force on Agalega to over 500. Resettlement on Hauritius or Wahd need not therefore involve more than a small residue of the existing population of the islands acquired for defence purposes. It is essentially a question of negotiation and enquiry which should be begun as soon as practicable.

75. It has not been attempted to do more than set out in general terms the problems involved and to suggest the lines on which further action might be taken. The cost will depend on direct negotiations with the owners of the islands and with the governments of Mauritius and the Seycholles and on further investigations by the appropriate officers of the two governments.

76. It has been possible to suggest the basis of a firm offer for the acquisition of Coetivy. The basis of an offer for Diego Garcia has also been proposed in the absence of any suggestions, however tentative, from the Company and without the benefit of balance sheets. The financial basis for the purchase of Diego Garcia is indeed psculiarly difficult because the island was acquired as a speculative take—over of a bankrupt concern and its economic value is still largely potential.

and ats oconomic value is still largely potential.

77. The acquisition of Diego Carcia and Costivy cannot be regarded as a matter affecting only the present owners of those islands and their employees. Some ouid pro quo on the lines suggested in this report, and subject to the views of the Governor, may be required to make the transfer of the Cil Islands acceptable to Nauritius. As regards the Saychelles, this government cannot be expected to absorb any adverse economic and administrative consequences without assistance. Any cessation of recruitment for work on the islands caused by the redistribution of Seychelles now under contract on Diego Carcia and Costivy must affect the Seychelles. Defence plans for the outlying islands could also be more easily defended and made acceptable if they were to be accompanied by measures for the economic and social advancement of the Seychelles; but any such measures should be regarded as a separate issue.

British Indian Ocean Territory 1964-1968

Chronological Summary of Events relating to the Establishment of the B.I.O.T. in November, 1965 and subsequent agreement with the United States concerning the Availability of the Islands for Defence Purposes.

Purpose of the Paper

This paper gives a chronological summary of the history of the B.I.O.T. from the time when it first began to take shape as an idea, up to the end of 1968 approximately. The aim is to provide a convenient reference paper on questions relating to the B.I.O.T. and on the arrangements for joint defence facilities made with the United States. Throughout the paper references are given, where necessary, to the relevant F.O., C.O., and other sources. Annexed is a list of basic documents and reference papers under various headings.

Introductory Historical Note.

The British Indian Ocean Territory was established by Order in Council on 8 November, 1965. It comprises the Chagos Archipelago (the principal island of which is Diego Garcia), formerly administered by the Government of Mauritius; and the Farquhar Islands, Aldabra Group and the Island of Desroches, all formerly administered by the Government of Seychelles.

The B.I.O.T. was established primarily on the prompting of the United States because of its lack of bases or support points between the Mediterranean and the Pacific. The American idea of using British islands in the Indian Ocean for defence purposes goes back at least to 1962. The Chinese attack on India in 1962 had shown a need for facilities in the Indian Ocean area, and the impending British departure from Aden and elsewhere reinforced this need. In 1963 American proposals began to take definite shape.

In creating this new territory the intention was to make available for joint British and U.S. defence purposes islands with few or no permanent inhabitants, under direct British administration. In this way maximum security of tenure and freedom from political pressures could be expected. The U.K./U.S. Exchange of Notes, constituting an Agreement for the availability of the islands for defence purposes by both Governments, was made on 30 December, 1966.

SECRET 2. BRITISH INDIAN OCEAN TERRIPORY. Ghronological Summary of Events leading to its creation in November 1965; and subsequent Events relating to the establishment of U.K./U.S.

Defence Facilities In October, 1962, the Minister of Defence (Mr. Thorneyoroft) in conversation with the U.S. Defence Secretary, Mr. Robert S. Womamra, agreed to study use of British bases in time of war by U.S. forees. In April, 1963, the State Department proposed that the possible strategic use of certain small British-owned islands in the Indian Ocean should be discussed. The F.O. replied in July that they would welcome such talks and proposed that they be held in London. In August the State Department expressed interest in establishing a military communications station on Diego Gercia and asked to be allowed to make a survey. They were put off, since at the time elections were impending to Mauritius, and the time was therefore not suitable. 1. 1462-63 References to these exchanges is to be found in the brief dated 11 December dated 11 December 1963 prepared by the PUBD for the Foreign Secretary's use with the U.S. Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Rusk at a NATO meeting. U.S. Ambassador leaves memorandum with Foreign Office stating that U.S. would like to have further discussions on all "Indian Ocean problems including the Island Ease question and communications facilities on Diego Garcia". Nemorandum also referred to U.S. intention that a small Naval Carrier Force should pay periodic visits to the Indian Ocean area, beginning early in 1964 (the first visit took place in April 1965). 2. 11 December 1963 DEF 355/235/02 Mr. Rusk, U.S. Secretary of State on visit to London discusses facilities/ in Indian Ocean with Foreign Secretary. 	23 Apr. 1 1964.	In recommendation to Ministers that the proposals resulting from the U.S./U.K. meetings of February 25-27 should be approved, it was emphasized that the cost of defence arrangements in the Far East were out of proportion to the British stake in investment and trade in the area. Our effort was deployed less in defence of British interests than in support of the U.S., the Commonwealth and the free world. By persuading the United States to associate themselves more with Britain by using existing strategic facilities or developing new ones in places where there was no anti-colonial bias, or better still no inhabitants, our burden might be reduced. 56	10 June 1966	Ministers decide that Aldabra is a suitable site for a staging post in the Western Indian Ocean and that the U.S. Government be approached to share the facilities and pay helf the estimated cost of £18 m. Also decided that a further survey be carried out to find the best location for an airfield and make a more accurate costs estimate. Such a staging post was consistent with the Defence Review philosophy of having means of reaching trouble spots in an emergency rather than maintaining large forces in overseas bases. Annex 25

U.K. Foreign Office, U.S. Defence Interests in the Indian Ocean: Memorandum of U.K./U.S. London Discussions, FCO 31/3437 (27 Feb. 1964)

ANNEX I

U.S. Defence Interests in the Indian Ocean Memorandum of U.K./U.S. London Discussions February 1964

Official discussions between representatives of the U.K. and U.S. Governments took place in London from February 25-27, 1964. On the U.K. side, the Foreign Office, Commonwealth Relations Office, Colonial Office, Ministry of Defence and Service Departments took part. On the U.S. side, the Departments of State and of Defense and the military commands concerned were represented. A list of both delegations is at Annex A. The following is agreed between the two sides as recording the results of the discussions and recommendations to their respective governmental authorities for future action.

Background

- 2. The U.S. Government is considering a greater defense presence in the Indian Ocean area to complement (but not in any way to replace) the existing British effort in this area. U.S. participation is likely to mean over a period of time:
 - (a) Periodic visits by a U.S. task force into the Indian Ocean area
 - (b) The installation of military communications and technical facilities on islands under British sovereignty
 - (c) The development of austere base facilities to support U.S. forces which may be deployed in the area.

H.M.G. in the U.K. have welcomed this American initiative and agree that their joint basic objectives in the Indian Ocean area are first to deter Communist encroachment on countries bordering the Indian Ocean and second to have the capacity to deal firmly and rapidly with local disturbances in the area.

3. It was accepted by both delegations that the U.S. interest in developing a greater defense presence and support facilities in the area was conceived as a complement to the existing U.K. strength posture, and would provide a valuable joint insurance in case of any loss or limitation of use of existing facilities.

Political reactions by countries on the periphery and presentation by both Governments to third countries of the American initiative

- 4. The two delegations agreed on a joint assessment (at Annex B) of the probable reactions of countries on the periphery to the American initiative and on the line which should be followed by both Governments in presenting this, as the need arises, to third countries.
- 5. As regards periodic visits of the task force, the U.S. delegation agreed to keep H.M.3. informed of U.S. general intentions and, in particular, to give as much notice as possible of requests to visit any U.K. bases.

U.S. Interest in technical and support racilities

- 6. The U.S. delegation confirmed their positive interest in the development of a communications facility, subject to joint survey, in Diego Garcia in the Chagos /rchipelago, which is now under the administration of Mauritius. They also expressed interest in the development of susters support facilities in Diego Garcia, and in a lower order of priorities possibly in Aldabra, the remainder of the Seychelles area, and the Cocos Keeling Islands (under Australian administration). Such facilities might include in the long-term:-
 - (a) Stockpile area for substantial portion of an Army division plus other pre-stockage facilities.
 - (b) Air base capable of supporting cargo, troop carrier, and tanker aircraft. Facilities to support antisubmarine patrol operations and air logistic operations. Parking area for two to four squadrons of aircraft.
 - (c) Naval anchorage and base area to support a carrier task force, amphibious, and support ships.
 - (d) Communications station.
 - (e) Amphibious staging area.
 - (f) Space tracking and communications facilities.
 - (g) Fuel and ammunition storage.
 - (h) Secondary support anchorages and logistic air strips.

The U.K. delegation reserved their position about the dimensions of any space tracking racilities which the U.S. might possibly propose to establish on Diego Garcia.

The U.S. delegation recognized that topography might preclude the location of facilities for the above objectives in one single island and, since the entry of their forces into the area in individual instances might be from either Bast or West, according to circumstances, envisaged the development of some support facilities at both extremes of the Indian Ocean, with, ideally, a principal base area in the center. The U.S. delegation emphasized that they wisher to avoid the political problems arising from the development of military facilities in populated areas and to have assured security of tenure for at least 25 years.

Diego Garcia

7. Subject to survey, the U.S. delegation envisaged that if H./... agreed, the most suitable arrangement would be that H.M.G. shoul. responsible for making available the necessary land, at H.M.G.'s expense. H.M.G. would also be responsible for any reastlement of population and compensation. For their part the U.S. Government would undertake to accept construction and maintenance costs of the facilities they would build and to share the facilities with the U.K. The two Governments would consult as necessary about the establishment of any possible U.K. military facilities which might be required in the island.

- 8. It was agreed however by both delegations that it would be imprudent to undertake any survey until the constitutional future of Diego Garcia (together with the remainder of the Chagos Archipelago) was determined. The U.K. delegation undertook to recommend to H.M.G. that in the light of the joint strategic interest, the feasibility of the transfer of the administration of Diego Garcia (and the remainder of the Chagos Archipelago) and the Agalega Islands from Mauritius should be pursued as rapidly as possible and to inform the U.S. authorities if and when such transfer was effected.
- 9. When it is agreed that a survey can take place, this should be a joint project, under U.K. auspices, with the U.S. contingent of minimum size necessary. The U.K. would provide one of H.M. ships for the purpose.

Aldabra

10. The U.S. delegation expressed a possible interest in the eventual development of an air staging post in the Western Indian Ocean. Aldabra seemed a likely possible site for this. The U.K. delegation said there might well be a future U.K. requirement of a similar nature in this area and made available to the U.S. side a survey for a possible airfield, which had already been completed of Aldabra. Consideration of such a facility was agreed by both delegations to be a matter for further reference to governmental authorities.

Cocos/Keeling Islands

11. The U.S. delegation explained that they had already been advised informally by Australian authorities of interest in U.S. use of facilities to be developed in the Cocos/Keeling islands. It was agreed by both delegations that since the U.K. also shared a positive interest in facilities there, further approaches to the Australians might best be undertaken in concert by the U.K./U.S. At the same time a general explanation would be given to the Australians of the discussions held between the U.K. and the U.S. It was agreed that the U.K. and U.S. Governments would keep in close touch on this matter.

Summary of agreed recommendations

- 12. The U.K. delegation agreed to recommend to the U.K. governmental authorities that they should;-
 - (a) Consider favourably the possibility of the development by the U.S. of such facilities on U.K. island possessions as they may require, on the following general principles:-
 - (1) H.M.G. should be responsible for acquiring land, resettlement of population and compensation at H.M.G.'s expense.
 - (ii) U.S. Government should be responsible for all construction and maintenance costs.

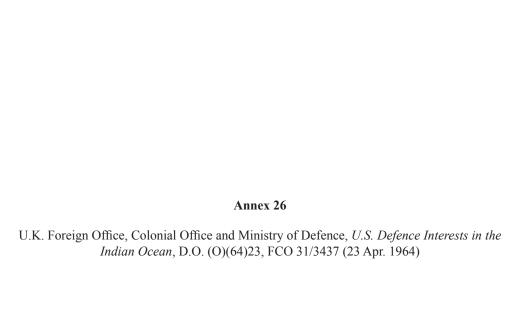

(iii) U.S. Government would share these facilities, during development and subsequently, with the U.K.

(iv) The two governments would consult as necessary about the establishment of any possible U.K. military facilities that might be required.

- (b) Pursue as rapidly as possible the feasibility of transfer of the administration of Diego Garcia (and other islands in the Chagos Archipelage) and the Agalega Islands from Mauritius.
- (c) As soon as politically practicable, facilitate a joint survey of Diego García and any other islands under British sovereignty in the Indian Ocean area that the U.S. may require.
- 13. The U.S. delegation agreed:-
 - (a) To recommend to the U.S. Government Authorities acceptance of the proposals set out in paragraph 12 above.
 - (b) To consider further the location of a site for an air staging post in the Western Indian Ocean.
 - (c) To consider further whether jointly to approach the Australian Government regarding possible use of facilities in the Cocos/Keeling Islands.
 - (d) To communicate further with the U.K. regarding all the above.

DEFENCE AND OVERSEA POLICY (OFFICIAL) COMMITTEE

U.S. DEFENCE INTERESTS IN THE INDIAN OCEAN

MEMORANDUM BY THE FOREIGN OFFICE, THE COLONIAL

OFFICE AND THE MINISTRY OF DEFENCE

As a result of discussions between United Kingdom and United States officials in London, from February 25 - 27 a Memorandum (Annex I) was agreed for submission to Governments.

Background

2. The Americans have at present no forces or bases between the Pacific and Mediterranean, apart from a few naval vessels in the Persian Gulf. The United States Administration supports our position in Aden and Singapore. Their interest in the Indian Ocean area has gradually developed over the past few years and gained impetus as a result of the Chinese attack on India in 1962. They have, however, been restrained by considerations of finance and, although they showed interest in establishing certain technical facilities on islands in the area, it was not until December 1963 that their strategic interest took the positive and public form of a decision to deploy a naval task force into the Indian Ocean from time to time. Formal notification to Her Majesty's Government of this intention took place on December 11 last and on December 19 the Foreign Secretary told Mr. Rusk in London that Her Majesty's Government welcomed the American decision and also confirmed our readiness to receive a group of United States officials to discuss the development of support facilities on islands under Eritish control.

Strategic Importance of the Indian Ocean

- British strategy in this area has a three-fold aim:-
 - To prevent the spread of communism by supporting the Central and South-East Asia Treaty Organisations. (a)
 - (b) To protect vital British and Commonwealth interests, instance in the Porsian Gulf and Melaysia.
 - To maintain an effective presence over the whole area so as to prevent the development of a power vacuum. (c)

This strategy depends at present on our use of the main bases at Aden and Singapore and on our intermediate staging prats at Mesirah and Gan. Should any of these facilities t denied us we should, if we wish to maintain our strategic aims, have to reprovide the lost facilities elsewhere in the area. The possible construction of suitably placed United States facilities across the Indian Ocean which we should be able to use would therefore provide a very valuable insurance policy at a relatively small premium against possible loss or limitation of use of any of these facilities. A map of the area is at Annex II.

Analysis of United Kingdom/United States Discussions

- 4. The Americans, as shown in the Memorandum, contemplate a greater defence presence in the Indian Ocean to complement (but not in any way to replace) the existing British effort in the area. This is likely to mean over a period of time:-
 - (a) Periodic visits by a naval task force;
 - (b) the installation of military communications and technical facilities;
 - (c) the development of base facilities (together with air staging posts) to support United States forces.
- 5. It being established that Her Majesty's Government had already welcomed American intentions, the joint aim in the discussions was to find common ground for the development of United States support facilities on British island possessions in such a way that the United Kingdom would also enjoy the strategic benefits. It seems clear that, even if their pace is slow, the Americans will definitely enter the area in one way or mother, and it is therefore in the United Kingdom's long term interests to strike the best bargain possible for the benefit of both countries.
- 6. The principles of such a bargain which the two delegations agreed to recommend were that it would be Her Majesty's Government's responsibility to acquire land, resettle population and pay any necessary compensation. The United States Government would be responsible for all construction and maintenance costs. As regards joint use, the United States Government would share any facilities, during development and subsequently, with the United Kingdom, and the two Governments would consult as necessary about the establishment of any possible United Kingdom military facilities that might be required (i.e. separate facilities from those developed by the United States but in the same area).
- 7. From the defence point of view such a bargain should be extremely divantageous to the United Kingdom and the joint recommendations in paragraph 12 of the Memorandum have already been strongly endorsed by the Chiefs of Staff, though they point out that United Kingdom interests must be safe-guarded during negotiations. From the international political point of view, the proposals are also attractive. American interest in the area is likely to increase in any event, but as shown in Arnex B of the Memorandum the Americans are favourably disposed to consultation with us on the political presentation of their actions. By offering our co-operation we shall be able to influence these in a direction favourable to the policies of Her Majesty's Government. This influence would, owever, be weakened if we introduced unacceptable conditions before attempting to put into effect the recommendations in paragraph 12 of the Memorandum.

8. We must, nevertheless, not overlook the United Kingdom's reputation as a Colonial power. It would be imprudent to expose ourselves to international and local criticism of trafficking in Colonial territory without regard to the reasonable interests of the colonies concerned (Mauritius and Seychelles). On the other hand we must look to our broader responsibilities to our remaining Colonial territories all over the world. As explained above, the Unite States proposals, if put into effect, would provide a valuable alternative means of maintaining the free world's derence posture in the Indian Ocean and further East, which is essential if we are to continue to be responsible in the last resort for the maintenance of law and order in and defence of our remaining dependent territories in these areas.

Future Action by the United Kingdom

- 9. There are, however, as the Americans recognised, considerable local political and economic problems to be settled before we can authorise the Americans to make any surveys. The principle difficulty lies in the fact that the most suitable island for development as an American "aust-re" base is Diego Garcia in the Chagos Archipelago which, though about 1500 miles from Mauritius, is under Mauritius administration. We have to consider how best to arrange matters so that this island, if developed as a base, together with the surrounding Archipelago, can be freed from future political and economic encumbrances, which might nullify its strategic usefulness. We must also consider how best to proceed in order to avoid damaging our future political relations with an independent Mauritius, and, in particular, risking the security of our important Naval Communications station on that island.
- 10. The course which would best satisfy our major interests would appear to be to decide now to detach Diego Garcia (and other islands in the Chagos Archipelago), and possibly the Agalega Islands from Mauritius, well in advance of Mauritian independence, and to place these under direct United Kingdom administration. This could be done by Order in Council, which could provide for the new territory to be administered by a High Commissioner or Administrator who might be either a Service Officer(cf. the Sovereign Base Areas in Cyprus) or the Governor of the Soychelles or of Mauritius (preferably the former) in his persual capacity (cf. British Antartic territory). When this has been done, or sooner if politically possible, we should be able to tell the mericans may however press us to arrange a joint survey. The Americans may however press us to arrange a survey more urgently, before the constitutional action has been taken. We should therefore proceed with that action as quickly as possible.
- 11. Formally, we have the constitutional power to take action without the consent of the Mauritius Government, although it consists almost entirely of elected Ministers. To do this, however, would expose us to criticism in Parliament and the United Nations and damage our future relations with "wuritius. Moreover, in as much as there would still be a scal population, albeit very small in number, in the Chagos Islands other than Diego Garcia, we might be criticised for creating for strategic purposes a new Colony with a less advanced constitution than it theoretically enjoys as part of Mauritius, and with no prospect of evolution. But this criticism would lose most of its force if the action were accepted by Mauritian Ministers in advance. It is therefore desirable to secure their positive consent, or failing that, at least their acquiescence.

 12. If we are to do this we are bound to take them reasonably full into our confidence at the outset. We have promised the Americans that we will consult them before this is done and on the terms to be used. The Americans will be reluctant to accept that the Mauritians should be told about the extent of United States participation or about their specific strategic interests. In the short term it might at first sight appear that, if only to avoid the risk of premature leaks, and the consequent raising of the price, it would suit us better to confront the Mauritians with a fait accompli or at most tell them at the last moment what we are doing. But the Colonial Office are convinced, as is the Governor, that this would do lasting damage to our relations with Mauritius and would adversely affect the facilities which our Services now enjoy in Mauritius itself. We have considered whether the Americans' share in the enterprise could be concealed, but since it would eventually become know, we could be charged with duplicity and the damage would be as great and possibly greater. We might, however, be able to frame our explanation to the Mauritians in language which the imericans would accept and which would refer to the United Kingdom/United States joint interest in the Chagos Archipelago for the defence of the free world in which the Mauritians might, as future members of the Commonwealth, be expected to share. Such an explanation would eschew any particular description of the nature of the strategic facilities or their purpose.
- 13. It must be recognised that there will be a demand for compensation, rot only to the private land owners in the Chagos archipelago (1 Seychellois consortium), but to the Mauritius Government as the price of their consent, and possibly to the Scychelles Government for loss of export duty on the copra which is exported through Seychelles. There will also be a sizeable pro lem of re-settling the will also be a sizeable pro lem of re-settling the inhabitants of Diego Garcia. Consideration of all three might best await the initial consultation with Mauritius and subsequent surveys. c do not envisage asking the Americans to accept any part of this bill.
- 14. There remains the question of Aldabra Island, which is at present under the administration of the Beychelles. In paragraph 13 of the Memorandum the Americans agreed to consider further the location of a site for a staging post in the Western Indian Ocean, to balance their separate interests in staging facilities, which we share, on the Australian-owned Cocos-Keeling Island in the Eastern Indian Ocean. The Americans considered Aldabra a potential site for the rmer purpose and were glad to raceive a copy of the survey already made by the Air Force Department. If this idea were pursued, and we could achieve full and unimpeded use of Aldabra, it would be a most useful strategic asset to the United Kingdom on an eventual round africa route to the Middle and Far last. The strategic importance of a staging post on Aldabra would be greatly increased if, after Mauritius gains independence, we found we could not rely on air staging facilities there in all circumstances. There would therefore be advantage in considering how best to ensure that Aldabra Island be retained indefinitely under Her Majesty's Government's direct control and at the same time encouraging the Americans to pursue their interest in Aldabra as an air staging post, which we would share. There might be advantage in detaching Aldabra from the Seychelles at the same time as we detach Chagos, and possibly Agalega from Mauritius but this needs further exemination with the Governor.

Recommendation

- 15. The Committee is invited to recommend that Ministers:
- Approve the principles of the United Kingdom/ United States Memorandum, provided that reasonable financial arrangements can be made;
- (b) invite the Foreign Secretary, in consultation with the Colonial Secretary, to seek American agreement to an approach to Mauritius Ministers on the lines of paragraph 12 above;
 - invite the Colonial Secretary, when this has been done, to consult the Mauritius Government with a view to detaching Diego Garcia (and other islands in the Chagos Archipelago) from the administration of Mauritius and retaining them under Her Majesty's Government's direct control;
 - (d) invite the Colonial Office to arrange for similar action for the galega Islands to be considered;
- (e) invite the Foreign Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of State for Defence, as soon as constitutional action for detachment is completed, or sooner if politically practicable, to arrange for a joint United Kingdom/United States survey of Diego Garcia and any other islands in the Chagos and Agalega Archipelagos which the United States may require;
- (f) invite the Colonial Secretary to consider detaching Aldabra also from the Seychelles administration;
- (g) invite the Colonial Office to produce as soon as possible an estimate of cost to Her Majesty's Government arising from land acquisition, resettlement of population and payment of compensation.

Dear Geoffrey: Zu/Z | States review of the joint U.S./U.K. survey of certain Indian Ocean Islands for military purposes.

After considering the report of the survey group, we have concluded that the areas having the most potential for U.S. military requirements are:

A. Diego Garcia. As you are aware, this site is required for establishment of a communications station and supporting facilities, to include an air strip and improvement of off-loading capability. We consider that detachment proceedings should include the entire Chagos archipelago, primarily in the interest of security, but also to have other sites in this archipelago available for future contingencies.

With respect to the communications station and supporting facilities, we would expect to initiate architectural, engineer and design work as quickly as the site was available for detailed topographical surveys. We enticipate that we will break ground late in calendar year 1966 for the permanent facilities, and have the station operational late in calendar year 1968. In the interim, should circumstances demand, we would wish to establish austere communications on a van-mounted, concrete-pad-supported basis within a period of three to five months, assuming satisfactory arrangements can be made for the support of 40 to 50 operating personnel.

B. Aldabra. Although nothing specific has been planned and no funding requests are scheduled by the U.S. at this time, the obvious potential usefulness of Aldabra as a staging area for air operations impels a strong recommendation, that in joint long-term U.S./U.K. interest, this island be included in any detachment package.

C. Coetivy, Agalega, Farquahar, Ile des Roches, and Cosmoledos. Since we appreciate your desire to undertake all detachment proceedings at the same time, we strongly urge that your Government consider favorably the inclusion of all, or some of these islands, in the order listed. They too have military potential, and again over the long-term, we consider that our mutual security interests in the Indian Ocean justify detachment on a precautionary planning basis, particularly if the resulting political and financial burden is not disproportionate to the indicated long-range advantages of assuring the availability of these islands.

We recognize the difficulties that Her Majesty's Government will face in undertaking the necessary steps to detach these islands. Accordingly, we will respond as fully and promptly as possible to any questions which you may have in order to facilitate the necessary decisions on your part. Wore specifically, we are prepared to meet with United Kingdom representatives on relatively the same representational level and basis as the meetings of last February, should your Government consider that this would be helpful in furthering our joint interest in moving this project forward rapidly.

Sincerely,

George S. Newman //. Counselor for Politico-Military Affairs

Dear Ted,

As foreshadowed in Oliver Forster's letter 119101/650 of January 4 to Graham in P.U.S.D., Jeff Kitchen asked me to call today and read out to me the text of a State Department telegram instructing the American Embassy in London to speak to the Foreign Office about the islands in the Indian Ocean. In case it may be useful to you I enclose a copy of the substantive part of the telegram.

2. When asked to give an idea of your reactions I said that you would be glad that the State Department had finally induced the Pentagon to divulge their ideas in detail, but I thought you might find that the amount of real estate involved was rather formidable. To this Kitchen replied that the United States were only immediately interested in the first two items in the list, but he understood that we were interested in Agalega and it had been thought in the State Department that it might be helpful to us for the American list to include these two islands. From the wider point of view, he believed that in five or ten years' time the United Kingdom and United States might be very glad to have all the islands named evailable for use in case of need, and, since you had said that we could not take two bites at the cherry of detachment, it had been thought only prudent to include all groups that were likely to be useful in the long run.

3. Kitchen said that if, after all concerned in London had had time to digest the information conveyed by the Embassy, you thought that it would be helpful to have another meeting on the lines of that which you chaired last year, the State Department would be very willing to send a test to the U.K. In reply to a question about the timing for any such meeting, he said he was thinking in terms of talks on the subject before the end of February, should we decide that such talks were required.

L. A member of Kitchen's staff interjected that the State Department's telegram to their Embassy had not made clear that the Department of Defense would like the architectural and engineering design team necessary to undertake the preliminary planning on Diego Garcia, to reach the island before the end of May.  6. The question of adverse reactions in the United Nations or Africa did not seem to be worrying either Kitchen or Myers, who was also present. So far as the Committee of Twenty-Four is concerned, I gathered that its mandate would have to be renewed by the General Assembly, which could mean that the Committee would be in suspended animation for some time to come. In any case, Kitchen seems to believe even more strongly than before that a reference to the value of the proposed installations in support of possible future peace-Reeping operations will soothe any savage breasts. He admitted, however, that recent events in the Congo might affect this.

Dear Geoffrey:

In our meeting on January 26 you requested urgent answers, even on a partial or tentative basis, to a number of specific questions regarding proposed facilities in the Indian Ocean islands.

I have now been authorized to provide you the following responses, keyed to corresponding sections of your letter:

(a) The Chagos Archipelago and Diego Garcia

We would not regard the detachment of the entire Chagos Archipelago as essential, but consider it highly desirable. It appears to us that full detachment now might more effectively assure that Mauritian political attention, including any recovery pressure, is diverted from Diego Garcia over the long run. In addition, as indicated in my letter of January 14, full detachment is useful from the military security standpoint, and provides a source for additional land areas should requirements arise which could not be met on Diego Garcia.

(b) Aldabra

Our interest in Aldabra arises in large part from the strong interest initially expressed by the U.K. in the development of an air staging base there, and our conclusion that there is an increasing need for dependable long-term accesses to Africa south of the Sahara. We have no immediate requirement for other facilities on Aldabra, and cannot predict when we will be in a position to fund for the concerted development of the air staging base itself. The requirements for a communication station at Diego Garcia antedates specific interest in Aldabra and, although staging facilities if constructed at these sites would be mutually supporting, the initial mission at Diego Garcia does not depend upon any development at Aldabra.

Head, Permanent Under-Secretary's Department, Foreign Office.

(c) Remaining Islands

- (1) The priority order is based on the topographic and hydrographic data gathered in last summer's joint surveys, and the geographical position of the islands.
- (ii) Taking the islands as a group, we consider them to have potential usefulness for airstrips, anchorages, Pol supply points, pre-positioning of materiel, and support of space programs. We have not identified particular objectives for individual locations, except in the sense of concluding that certain facilities would be excluded by physical characteristics such as space limitations or poor anchorage.
- (iii) We do not have any schedule for facilities at these locations. This would depend upon the development of future military requirements.

(d) General

From our standpoint there would be no reason to relocate population prior to an island's coming into use to meet a requirement. This would apply to the other islands of the Chagos Archipelago so long as our activity was confined to Diego Garcia.

(e) Local Labor

We do not in principle exclude the use of local labor for construction work. As you will recognize, in practice the extent to which local labor can be used depends upon such factors as availability of appropriate skills, possible balance of payments considerations, and the value to the contractor of key personnel from his own staff.

I hope that this information will provide you sufficient basis for requisite political decisions within Her Majesty's Government, and with the governments concerned. Please let us know if you need anything further.

Sincerely,

George S Newman Counselor for Folltico-Military Affairs

DEFENCE INTERESTS IN THE INDIAN OCEAN

Discussions with the Americans have been going on for some time at the official level about the proposals for military facilities on one or more of the small island dependencies of Mauritius and the Seychelles. The United States Embassy have warned us that Mr. Rusk may ask the Secretary of State how the matter stands, since the American side are waiting for a reply to their proposals.

2. The background is as follows. Ever since the Chinese attack on India, and possibly even before that, the Americans have been conscious of a gap in their military dispositions in the Indian Ocean area. They have no forces continuously deployed between the Mediterranean and the South China Sea and no bases between the Mediterranean and the Philippines. In December 1963 they announced that a carrier task force would pay periodic visits to the Indian Ocean area. Her Majesty's Government welcomed this move, and two visits have since taken place. In February 1964 it was agreed between United States and British officials that, subject to the results of a survey, a United States military communications station and supporting facilities should be built on the island of Diego Garcia in the Chagos Archipelago, administered by Mauritius but over a thousand miles North-East of the main island. It was further agreed that this might turn out to be the beginning of a project on a wider scale with other facilities in the western part of the Indian Ocean (perhaps on Aldabra, an island administered by the Seychelles), with the possibility of more facilities in the eastern part of the Indian Ocean (perhaps in the Cocos-Keeling Islands, which are administered by Australia). The Americans were at pains to emphasise that this initiative was intended to complement, and not to replace, the British military effort in the area. They also made it plain that any islands chosen for military facilities must be free from local pressures which would threaten security of tenure, and that in practice this must mean that the islands would be detached from the administration of Mauritius (soon due for independence) and of the Seychelles (where pressure for independence is beginning to be felt).

3. It was agreed that the United States Government would pay for any facilities constructed, allowing us joint use at all times; while Her Majesty's Government would be responsible for making the chosen islands available and for paying the necessary compensation to local interests. These principles were subsequently approved by Ministers in London. 4. A joint Anglo-American survey of a number of likely islands, including Diego Garcia, was carried out from June to August 1964. The Premier of Mauritius (Dr. Ramgoolam) and the Executive Council of the Seychelles were consulted beforehand and raised no objection to the survey. An approach was also made to Dr. Ramgoolam about the possibility of detaching islands in the Chagos Archipelago from the Mauritius administra-His reaction was guarded. Rumours had for some time been current in the islands that the Americans proposed to build 'bases' in the area. At about this time there appeared a number of speculative stories in the world press. turn gave rise to unfavourable reactions from some of the governments of African and Asian countries bordering on the Indian Ocean, as well as from the Soviet Union, the United Nations, and the Cairo Conference of Non-Aligned Countries.

The public line we took in reply was that certain communications and other facilities were a possibility but that no decision had been taken.

- 5. The American Embassy have recently produced proposals for the use for defence purposes of seven islands administered by Mauritius and the Seychelles, listed in three categories of priority. First comes Diego Garcia (where it is proposed to make a start as soon as possible on the construction of a communications station, together with an airstrip) and in the interests of security and future expansion, the rest of the Chagos Archipelago; second comes the island of Aldabra as a site for an air staging post, to be constructed at some time unspecified in the future; and thirdly, a list of five islands (Coetivy, Agalega, Farquhar, Ile des Roches, and Cosmoledos) which the Americans considered might be useful for unspecified defence facilities at some future date.
- 6. This is how the matter rests. Ministers will shortly be asked to reaffirm Her Majesty's Government's general support for this scheme and to agree that the Colonial Office should undertake the necessary constitutional steps in Mauritius and the Seychelles. Meanwhile the Ministry of Defence, in conjunction with other interested Departments, are calculating the cost of the acquisition of the islands chosen and assessing the military potentialities of each island. It is hoped that a paper will be circulated to Ministers within the next two or three weeks.
- 7. The Secretary of State will not wish to raise the subject, since we are not ready to give a substantive answer. If Mr. Rusk raises it, the Secretary of State can say that we regard the plan as an imaginative and valuable concept, that we are examining the American proposals as a matter of urgency, but that as Mr. Rusk will understand, there are a number of different and difficult aspects to be considered, and we are not quite ready to give a reply. If the Secretary of State is able to secure the agreement of the Colonial Secretary and the Defence Secretary, before he leaves for Washington, to his giving a more encouraging reply to Mr. Rusk, so much the better.

Legal Status of Chagos, Aldabra,

Note by the Secretary of State for the Colonies

At the meeting of the Committee on the 12th April I was invited to circulate a report on the status of the Indian Ocean islands which it is proposed should be made available for joint U.K./U.S. defence developments. This I now circulate at Annex.

- 2. The islands in question are the Chagos Archipelago (i.e. Diego Garcia, Six Islands, Peros Banhos, Salamon Islands and Trois Freres, including Danger Island and Eagle Island), the Aldabra Group, Desroches and Farquhar and, as the annexed report makes plain, they are all legally established as being parts of the Colonies of Mauritius or Seychelles. To separate them from Mauritius and Seychelles would require the making of amendments to existing constitutional instruments.
- To establish the islands as a separate new administration would require a further and separate Order in Council.

A.G.

Colonial Office, Great Smith Street, S.W.1. 27th April, 1965 SECRET

ANNEX

Note on the Legal Status of the Islands of the Chagos Archipelago, the Aldabra Group and the Farquhar Islands

Chagos Archipelago

There can be no legal doubts about the position over the Lesser Dependencies of Mauritius, which include the Chagos Archipelago. Section 90(1) of the Mauritius (Constitution) Order,1964 defines Mauritius as meaning "the island of Mauritius and the Dependencies of Mauritius". "Dependencies" are defined in section 5(1) of the Mauritius Interpretation and General Clauses Ordinance, 1957, as being "Rodrigues and the Lesser Dependencies" commonly called the "Oil Islands". The "Oil Islands" are defined as including the islands of the Chagos Archipelago.

Aldabra Group, Desroches and the Farquhar Islands

2. There is also no doubt as to the legal status of these islands since they form part of the Colony of Seychelles by virtue of the definition of the boundaries of that Colony in clause 1(1) of the Seychelles Letters Patent of 15th March, 1948.

Separation

3. The separation of the Chagos Islands from Mauritius could best be achieved by an amendment of section 90(1) of the Mauritius Constitution Order in Council, 1964, so as to include a reference to the Dependencies by name; the Mauritius Interpretation and General Clauses Ordinance, 1957, should be amended accordingly. Separation of Aldabra, Desroches and Farquhar from Seychelles would necessitate suitable amendments being made to the Letters Patent.

New Administrative Unit

4. The establishment of a new administrative unit consisting of all these islands would require a prerogative Order in Council, perhaps containing a reference to the Colonial Boundaries Act, 1895, as an enabling power. This would probably best be on the model of the British Antarctic Territory Order in Council, 1962. This would establish the office of e.g. High Commissioner, allowing anyone

/e.g.

(e.g. the Governor of Seychelles) to be appointed to this post, and would provide that he should exercise such functions as are conferred on him by the Order or assigned by Her Majesty. The High Commissioner could be empowered to make laws for the territory and to constitute offices.

Defence Facilities in the Indian Ocean.

Please speak to Mr. Rusk or an appropriately senior member of the State Department, on the following lines.

- 2. As the Prime Minister has already told Mr. Rusk, we are anxious to press ahead with this project as rapidly as possible. We consider that the islands chosen for defence facilities to be developed either immediately or in due course, should be Diego Garcia and the rest of the Chagos Archipelago (Mauritius) and the islands of Aldabra, Farquhar and Des Reches (Scychelles). Agalega (Mauritius) and Coctivy and Cosmoledes (Scychelles) should be dropped.
- 3. It is now clear that in each case the islands are legally part of the territory of the colony concerned. Generous compensation will, therefore, be necessary to secure the acceptance of the proposals by the local Governments (which we regard as fundamental for the constitutional detachment of the islands concerned) in addition to compensation for the inhabitants and commercial interests which will be displaced. The total may come to as much as £10 million. We should, therefore, like to discuss with the United States Government the possibility of a contribution to these costs from their side.
- A. You should add that Her Majesty's Government are not finally committed at this stage. We are; however, ready to approach the Seychelles and Mauritius Authorities with firm proposals for the detachment of the islands listed above. Timing of such an approach is not yet finally decided because of Mauritius political considerations.

- 5. Before making this approach it would be prudent to discuss what publicity line should be taken if the details should leak, and what approaches should be made in the capitals of the countries bendering the Indian Ocean who will be mainly concerned.
- 6. I should like to compare ideas with Mr. Rusk on this next week. It would be helpful if he could then give me at least a provisional answer to the suggestion in paragraph 3 above. Once a proposal is put to the Mauritius and Scychelles Authorities, a speedy (and therefore generous) settlement is most likely to be the best way of disarming criticism.

My telegram No. 3644 [of 1 Mey].

Answers to questions in your telegram No. 1666 are as follows:

Your paragraph 2. Constitutional conference has not been finally arranged but will probably take place in the autumn; Celemial Secretary has proposed September. Outcome is unlikely to take Emuritius further than full internal self-government. It is impossible to estimate when or indeed if Meuritius will achieve full independence. The great debate in Mauritius concerns the ultimate status of the island; both "Independence" and "Association" have strong support. strong support.

- Figure of £10 million is an outside estimate given the need to reach a quick settlement. It consists of:
 - (a) Resettlement and buying out commercial interests -

 - (a) Resettlement and buying out commercial interests Six million,
 (b) Airfield in Mahé (thought necessary to secure Seychelleis acceptance) £2-5 million.
 (c) At least equal compensation for Mauritius (population 720,000 as against Seychelles £5,000) -£2-5 million.
 (d) Allemance for feet that this is likely to become a bergaining counter in constitutional negetiations in Mauritius unless it is settled speedily (and therefore generously) say £2½ million.
- 5. Hyers' point is a fair one. But economic difficulties (particularly in defence field) have increased since February 1964, and estimated compensation is much greater than we thought then. United States Embassy (Nemman) are more relaxed about financial point and all we would like to propose at present is that a discussion on this might be initiated.
- 4. We objection to above figures being given to State Department but it must be understood that they are very rough approximations. Flease let us know when Mr. Rusk would be ready to discuss. What are his plans between last day of S.E.A.T.B. for which we hope he will be present and the opening of the N.A.T.O. Council?

You know of the proposals to detach certain islands from Hauritius and Saychelles for use for defence purposes. You are sware also that it is our view that willing acceptance in the two Colonies is essential to our object, and that in order to secure this it will be measure to compensate the two Governments for that I have determined. The likely form and scale of compensation were suggested in Hauritius telegram for some No.75, which has been directed.

- 2. I as writing now about the attribution to votes of any expenditure of this kind. We think Ministers should be enabled to see the full financial effects quite clearly when they came to decide on the proposals as a whole. We have all along resisted the suggestion that expenditure on compensation should be set from colonial Office Votes, or 0.0.8% Votes envering expenditure on dependent permitories, because we think that this would tend to mask the true cost of obtaining defence facilities by suggesting that compensation is a separate transmition accessory to seet some Colonial Office interest. There is in fact no colonial Office interest. There is in fact no colonial Office interest. There is in fact no colonial Office interest, we should have no reason for proposing either defence purposes, we should have no reason for proposing either their detachment or these payments to beautitus and Seyphelics, which will be cults outside the normal pattern of our aid. Compensation will be part of the price of obtaining defence facilities which the United Ringdom needs, and it would be wrong, and would set an undestrable precedent, to treat it otherwise.
- 3. Insofar as it is possible to distinguish departugated interests within the policies of H.M.C. as a shale (and this distinction is of course implicit in the Vote system) the interest here is clearly a Ministry of Defende one. We therefore remain firmly appeared to meeting any part of the costs from Colenial Office of C.D.M. Votes, and hope it can now be accepted that the cost of compensation should be met from Defence Votes.

You wrote on 17th June about defence interests in the Indian Goesn. Since then we have, as you know, during the Oxford Conference, discussed with the Governors of Saurittus and Saychalles the implications of detaching the various Islands from Esurittus and Saychalles. We know from the measurable which they submitted to the Drecign Office on the 2tth June (see Arthur's letter to Tright of the 25th June) that the Americans wished to discuss with H.R.G. as soon as possible "the principles on which access to the Inlunds, following their detachment, would be available to the United States". Finally as you know we hope, subject to the views of my Secretary of State, to cast the Governor of Saurittus and the Acting Sovernor, Saychelles to begin disconsition with their Governments in the week beginning the 19th July on the defence proposale as a whole (in fact the matter would be put to unofficials on 22nd July in Septhelles and on 23nd July in Hauritius when regular meetings of the Executive Council and of the Council of Ministers would take place). Before this is done we ought to try to provide acces guidance on the implications of detachment and, so far as we can see them at this stage, on the sort of arrangements we envirage for the Inlunds concerned after detachment; in particular we ought to try to provide as full an answer as possible to the questions raised in Seychelles telegram No. 15. From several points of view therefore there is some urgency in clarifying our views on these matters.

- As we see it questions arise under the following main heads:-
 - (1) Legal (2) Administrative (3) Financial.

The views jointly agreed between the Colonial Office and the two Governors on the points arising under these heads are set out below.

- 5. We are all agreed that the Islands must be constitutionally separate from the Colombes of which at present they form part, is I think you know our idea is that the High Commissioner for the detanded Islands should be the Governor of Seychelles wearing a separate hat. We are advised that the following action would be necessary:-
 - (a) Chagos would be separated from Hauritius by an emendmend of section 90(1) of the Mauritius Constitution Order in Council, 1964 so as to include a reference to the dependencies by /hame; name; the Mouritius Interpretation and General Clauses Ordinance, 1957 would be amended accordingly. Separation of Aldabra, Desroches and Farguhar from Seychelles would necessitate suitable amendments to the Letters Fatent.

J.A. Patterson, Maq., Treasury.

(b) An Order in Council, similar in form to the British Antarctic Territory Order in Council, 1962 - copy attached would be made to establish a separate territory.

As regards the law which would apply in the detached Islands you will see that the British Antarctic Territory Order in Council provided for the previously existing law to continue to apply after the appointed day and gave the High Commissioner power to make laws. We could not follow this pattern precisely in the present case since we are advised that it would not be legally practicable for there to be two codes of law applicable in the detached islands - namely, Scychelles-law in-Aldubra, Desroches and Farquhar and Mauritius law in the Chagos archipelago. We therefore consider that the Order in Council should provide that the Seychelles law will apply throughout the detached Islands from the appointed day.

As regards Diego Garcia we should have to work out in consultation with the Ministry of Defence, the Americans and the Covernor how cases arising, once British and American service personnel started moving in, should be dealt with. In the interin, however, (as far as Diego Gercia is concerned) and indefinitely (as regards detached islands not at once required for defence surposes) the island managers at present pessess maghsterial powers and the Righ Commissioner could, whether by law or by administrative arrangement, make provision for this to continue and for cases requiring it to be handled by the Courts of Seythelles. Some of the islands in the Chagos Archipelago are at present visited by Haurittus magistrates and the High Countaions would no doubt have to ensure that this continued, by arrangement with the Empritus Government, at any rate until alternative arrangements were made, coverment, at any rate until alternative arrangements were made.

4. As regards administration the present position is that the islands to be detached, and also those which will remain with Seychelles and Agalega which will remain with Servicels and Agalega which will remain with Servicels and Agalega which will remain with Services and Agalega which will remain with Services and Freytist, are provided by the island owners, though the Mauritius Government does we believe provide teachers and nurses in at any rate Blego Garcia and possibly in other islands of the Chagos Archipelago. Apart from this, however, the two Governments at present searcely do more than arranging infrequent visits by the Governor and officials including medical officers and (in the Mauritius islands) megistrates. Sevenelles has been actively considering improving matters (and they clearly should be improved - nurses and teachers on more of the islands are obvious reeds) and Kauritius has been considering improving the administration of Justice, but swen so nothing very elaborate would be involved. As regards the detached islands our view is that, particularly as any or all of them may have to be evacuated at eny time, there is no sense in setting up an elaborate administrative suchine; we presume that the Hintstry of Defance, who would concur in this. Our suggestion would be that in the detached islands the level of services provides should, in the short term, remain precisely as it is at present and that, as regards any improvements to be made in the longer term, the detached islands should keep in step with what is done in the remaining Seychelles islands; neither more nor less should be provided. This might involve the continued secondament of e.g., fauntitus teachers and nurses to certain of the detached allands, but the High Commissioner could no doubt make the necessary arrangements for this. As Seychelles improved its administration of its remaining islands some increase in costs in the detached islands would be involved; but the costs arising would in fact be negligible and any additional staff needed could be recruited in Seychelles by the High Commissioner. Similarly staff (e.g. medical staff) needed for periodic vicits could be provided from Seychelles on loan; whether visiting angistrates were still berrowed from Mauritius or whether arrangements were made for Seychelles to find them is a matter the High Commissioner could sort out.

5. By far the most difficult administrative problem arising from detachment however will clearly be the resettlement problem which at present of course arises only in connection with blego Garcia, involving about 480 people. We end the two Governors are agreed that our aims in this operation should be as follows:-

- (1) to resettle these people in other out-islands rather than in Mauritius or Seychelles themselves; this should cause a great deal less difficulty, making it easier for unofficials to accept our proposals as a whole, be more likely to be acceptable to the individuals concerned and finally be cheaper;
- (ii) not to resettle them on other detached islands if this can be avoided; this is obviously sestrable so as to avoid increasing our problem in these islands if and when they are needed for defence purposes;
- (111) to aim at resettling as many as possible (and certainly the Mauritians who are "licois") in Agalega. This is owned by the Chagos/Agalega Company which also owns Chagos; Mr. Moulins, the main shareholder, also owns Farquiar.
 - to secure American agreement to providing employment on biego Gardia for as many as possible of those to be resettled, for as long as possible, during the construction place. This would have the effect of spreading out the resettlement operation and thus facilitating its smooth progress; it would also ease the difficulties of Seychelles in taking back any Seychelled who could not be resettled in Agalega since the longer they could stay on working in Blego Gardia the nearer would be the time then work on eirfield construction in Habs (assuming that this is agreed as part of the compensation to secure Seychelles acquiescence in the defence project) would be available for them (the Governor estimates that work on the ground might start 18-24 months after a decision to build an airfield were taken).

Why so

6. We have considered the staff and other requirements of the resettlement operation. As far as we can judge at present these would in the main consist of t-

- (1) staff the High Commissioner would need one good expatriate administrative officer, together with a local assistant (who could be recruited in Beychelles) and supporting local staff for himself and the administrative officer;
- (ii) a ship to enable the detached islands to be administered (and which might also help with the resettlement operation); this would have to be large enough to cover over 2000 miles of open sea (from thate to blego Garcia and back) and might cost as much as £150,000 (unless the Einistry of Defancist cost as much as £150,000 (unless the Einistry of Defancist could provide scarcing suitable) though we have no firm figures yet; it could be crowed by Soychellois and serviced in Esychelles with major overheals in Ecombesa; there might however be some difficulty about finding a master mariner in Seychelles to command it.

We can foresee no need for separate buildings, telegraph facilities etc. for the high Commissioner and his staff. Existing facilities in Seychelles could be made use of and paid for. For contra Seychelles might well wish to make some use of the ship in commection with their intention of improving services to their own remaining out-telends; it would no doubt be possible for this to be arranged in conjunction with the resettlement operation and the High Commissioner could make a suitable charge to Seychelles for this assistance.

7. As regards financial matters the revenue deriving from these islands consists essentially of export duty on their copre shipped out through Seychelles and company tax on the profits of Moulinie's Seychelles and company tax on the profits of Moulinie's Seychelles-registered company. It would be impossible in gractical terms to separate this revenue out, and we think we should allow Seychelles to these this revenue as an office against the cost of services they will be providing for the detached islands. The cost of such services as the High Commissioner has to provide direct would be met from U.K. funds. It is relevant that all the detached islands, spart from U.K. funds, It is relevant that all the detached islands, spart from High which is Grown land, are owned either by the Chagos/Agalega Company, which is registered in Seychelles, or by individuals resident in Seychelles. Against this bedgeround we have, in consultation with the two Governors, considered the financial problems with particular reference to the questions asked by Hoyd in the fourth paragraph of his telegram No. 14.5. These are:

(a) whether we propose to settle the compensation figure at the time when an island is actually required for defence purposes or now, in advance?

(b) whether islands now forming part of Seychelles may benefit from facilities provided by the Seychelles Government (e.g. agricultural bank loans, fertilizer subsidies etc., and will pay Seychelles taxes).

and will pay beganelies values,

3. The first question to consider is whether it is in our interest that development of detached islands not immediately required, should be encouraged. It is, of course, obvious that if the islands were developed this would mean that compensation, if paid when they were later required for defence purposes, would be higher than if they had been neglected; and this applies a fortfort if Government had actually encouraged development. The continued active encouragement of long term development would therefore be a short sighted policy. On the other hand, it may well be that the Americans will not require the islands, other than than Mego Garcia, for some years to come, and some limited development which might result in increased employment opportunities, could facilitate the amount solution of the resettlement problem.

- 9. Against this background our conclusions were:-
- (i) no taxes should be levied by the High Commissioner in the detached islands; correspondingly no development incentives should be provided by the High Commissioner;
 - (ii) the Government of Soychelles should be free to continue to raise revenue in relation to commercial activities which continue in those of the detached islands which are not at once needed for defence purposes; it would continue, e.g. to levy export duties on the products of the islands which were exported through Seychelles and to tax the island owners; one consequence of this would be that the budgetary deficit position of Seychelles would not be adversely affected at this stage by the detachment operation;
- (iii) no long-term development incentives (p.g. tax remission for replanting) would be given to the owners of the detached islands which were not immediately needed.
- (iv) short-term development incentives (e.g. temporary tax holidays and fertilizer subsidies) would be given in relation to the detached islands which were not immediately needed. Full scale incentives both short and long-term would be given to the chagos/Applega Company in relation to Agalega; if necessary, amondments to Seychelles law to make this possible would have to be made. We are advised that deemite the fact that Agalega is Heuritius territory arrangements of this sort would not be ultra vires.
- (v) the points covered in (iii) and (iv) above would have to be covered in agreements over compensation negotiated with the Island owners. Bearing in mind (ii) above one of the conditions of the agreements would have to be that the Company would continue to be registered in Seychelles and that the produce would continue to be exported through either Seychelles or Mauritius as in the past;
- (vi) if conditions on these lines were imposed we might have to recognise that compensation for the Island owners might have to be paid over at the time of detachment, rather than when the islands were actually taken for defence use. In hegotiation with the Island owners we should at least have to leave this possibility open. In these circumstances the former owners staff continue to run the detached islands not immediately required as sgents for the High Commissioner.

10. The further points remain. In the first place, particular as we fould want help from Mr. Moulinie and the Charon/Agalega Company in resettlement on Agalega and bearing in mind that a good deal of development has already gone into some of the detached islands which they own, and that further long-term development plans which they have would have to be given up 'except (except in Agalega), we should have to recognise that these factors would have to be taken into account in fixing compensation and we should have to authorize the Acting Governor when he consults his unofficials about the defence proposals as a whole to make plain to Mr. Moulinie that these factors would be taken into account.

11. The second point concerns the position of Agalega. Newton in his report recommended that, in any case, this should be detached from Mauritius and attached to Seychelles. This would make sense, particularly as we would press the Chagos/Agalega Company to resettle labour from Diego Garcis there. Sir John Remnie thinks that it could well be raised in Mauritius and the Mauritius Government might well mink that to discubarrass themselves of the problem of administering a single remeining out-island would make sense. If this were proposed from Mauritius there would be no objection to going sheed with this change as a separate exercise from the detachment operation.

12. For the reasons given at the beginning of this letter there is great urgency about reaching at least provisional conclusions on these matters. I hope that you and Harris (0.7.M.) this letter has been copied can let he know by noon on Friday, this letter has been copied can let he know by noon on Friday, 16th July that you agree to what is proposed. If there are any difficulties I suggest that we should need at 3 p.h. on Friday to try and cort them out so that we may decide what guidence to try and cort them out so that we may decide what guidence to telegraph to, in particular, the acting Governor Seychelles.

U.K./U.S. Defence Interests.

Natter has now been considered by Ministers in light of your advice. Americans have been informed that while we could not agree to their proposals in full we are nevertheless willing in principle to pursue proposed joint development further on the basis that, subject to the agreement of the two Governments, which we regard as essential, we would be prepared to detach from Mauritius and Seyohelles and make available for our own and American use the following islands:

the whole of the Chagos Archipelsgo (including Diego Carcia), Aldabra, Parquiar and Desroches.

The position is thus that, whilst no final decision to proceed has yet been taken, provided that total compensation necessary to secure agreement of Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles is not too large, project will be proceeded with. As you know basic intention is that Britain should be responsible for cost of acquisition of necessary islands and compensation generally whilst Americans would finance construction costs of defence facilities.

2. Por your own information Ministers were when considering the matter, aware of my views on probable elements in compensation necessary to secure acceptance of these proposals by Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles as follows:-

- (i) unavoidable costs in respect of
 - (a) compensation for island owners;
 - (b) costs of resettlement of displaced labour;
- (ii) probable demands by Governments for compensation in respect of loss of territory (additional to existing and anticipated development assistance under normal arrangements) which might comprise
 - (a) provision of a grant to Seychelles sufficient to cover the cost of a full length civil airfield on Wahé (which we assume might be £2-3 m.);

	1.0	371/	18:
Market W. Co., Co., Co., Co., Co., Co., Co., Co.	CONTRIGHT	Vo: 10 8E 21	e or Suction Far	ACO PROCE

- (b) provision of a capital grant to Mauritius, the amount being almost certainly not less than that involved in (a) above;
- (iii) willingness to finalise on generous terms draft agreement covering the American Tracking Station in Seychelles which must in any case be settled as soon as possible and which unofficials would be likely to insist upon before considering any further facilities for Americans;
- (iv) possible additional demands from Mauritius ~
 - (a) to cooperate in a scheme to enable substantially more Mauritian emigrants to settle in Britain;
 - (b) to make efforts to secure American agreement to a substantial sugar expert quota for Mauritius to the U.S.A.
- 3. Expenses as at (i) in preceding paragraph are clearly unavoidable. So too no doubt are some substantial compensation payments on lines of (ii). As to (iii) we recognise that in this wider context this should not present undue difficulty. As to (IV) both these possible demands would cause us grave difficulties and we sincerely hope that Governor Mauritiue will be able to steer his Ministers off making them.
- 4. As indicated above no final decision on this project has yet been taken. In view of appreciable total compensation cost which seems inevitable we have raised with Americans question whether, without departing basically from division of costs of project indicated in paragraph 1 above, they would be prepared to make some contribution to compensation costs. The Americans have now stated that they are prepared in principle to make such a contribution. They have however stipulated (and we agree) that this fact and the method of payment, which would not be direct, must be kept strictly secret, and they attach the greatest importance to this. In any case, before Ministers here can take final decision on whether project should go shead, we need some clear indication as to amount and nature of compensation necessary to secure Mauritius and Seychelles agreement.
- 5. Ministers have therefore directed that discussions should now be opened with Mauritius and Seychelles Governments on proposals outlined in paragraph 1 above. The object of this initial round of consultations with -

(to (1)) your Ministers

(to (2)) members of your Executive Council would be:-

- to secure their reactions to proposed development on lines indicated in paragraph 1 above;
- (ii) to attempt to clarify likely compensation demands so as to enable us to gauge what it might be necessary to offer to secure willing and public acquiescence in proposed developments.

/You

OUTWARD TELEGRAM

FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES

You should not, of course, in these initial discussions indicate contents of paragraph 2 above. You should explain that before the British Government finally decides whether to go shead with the project it is necessary to have some idea of its likely cost since, if this were too high, it might not be possible, in view of current overseas finance difficulties, to proceed with it at all. The British Government does not wish -- to incur any expense or loss as a result of the operation and will naturally be responsible for meeting the cost of compensating landowners and also the cost of resettlement of displaced labour. In addition, the British Government recognises that it would be reasonable for the Governments of kauritiue and Seychelles to expect some element of compensation in view of the proposed detachment of territory and would welcome an indication from those Governments of their views as to the level of compensation likely to be required to make the project acceptable to their public opinion.

(to (1)) Mauritius

6. In putting the matter to your unofficials you should indicate that as regards Diego Garcia there is a firm requirement for the establishment of Communications Station and supporting facilities including an airstrip. As regards the remainder of the islands (including the remainder of the Chagos Archipelago) you should indicate that the requirement for these is in the nature of an insurance for the future, that no firm plans exist for early defence developments on them but that it is possible that air and/or haval facilities may be required in future years. In addition, you should make plain points about timing of movements of population and about use of local labour mentioned in paragraph 1 of my telegram —

(to (1)) Personal No. 66

(to (2)) No. 75.

telapo esse

In this connection with reference to 0.A.G. Seychelles telegram No. 101, whilst the Americans have indicated that they would not rule out possibility of employing Seychelles labour in connection with construction of facilities we know that this is likely to be difficult for them; any long-term employment possibilities once defence facilities are operational are extremely unlikely, 0.A.O. Seychelles should not therefore take initiative in raising this matter with members of Executive Council; if point is raised by them there would be no objection to saying that British Government recognises importance to Seychelles of additional employment opportunities and will certainly bear the point in mind. For your own information we, of course, have in mind in this connection that if civil sirried is built on Nach as part of ouid pro quo that if civil sirried is built on Nach as part of ouid pro quo

7. I assume that you will judge it useful to stress the importance of these developments in the context of future security in the Indian Ocean area. However, both we and the Americans are anxious to play down this argument and also the American strategic role; these aspects are liable to arouse particular suspicions and hostility in some of the countries around the Indian Ocean.

/In

Fo 371/181724 PHISSIDA

SECRET

In instructions to British and American posts abroad, therefore, as little as possible is being said about these points. I must leave it to you to decide how to deal with this dilemma; I suggest that if necessary you should say merely that in the short run we welcome joint Anglo/American developments in the area, even though their practical effects would be limited at first to communication and supporting facilities on one island. In the longer term we would regard the possible eventual construction of air or naval staging facilities on one or more of the islands as a potential contribution to the security of the area, to the cenerit of all concerned. You should add that H.M.G. hope that the proposals will be welcomed in Mauritius and Seychelles and tha they attach considerable importance to securing the support of that

(to (1)) your Ministers

(to (2)) members of your Executive Council to them.

8. You should explain that it would be intended that the islands in question should be constitutionally separated from Mauritius and Seychelles and established, by Order in Council as a separate British administration. The Americans would not be prepared to go shead on any other beais. Any suggestion of the islands required being made svailable on the basis of either leases be ruled out.

9. The above is also the answer to the point raised in O.A.G. Seychelles telegram No. 118 i.e. the Americans would not go ahead on any basis except excision. Excision would, of course, not (repeat not) affect constitutional relationship between Seychelles and Britain which would in any case be developed in the future as would be no objection to O.A.G. Seychelles speaking on these lines to members of Executive Council if matter is raised; for his own information, with reference to his telegram No. 108 and paragraph 4 of his telegram No. 118 I am satisfied that integration would be most unlikely to be acceptable to Parliament here.

most unlikely to be acceptable to Parliament here.

10. Present intended scope of development is as indicated in paragraph 6 above and you should not go beyond this. We recognise however that in light of recent newspaper speculation you may may be asked about possibility of islands being used in connection with nuclear forces. If this point is raised you can only say that it is an established point of both British and American policy never either to confirm or to deny the presence or absence of nuclear weapons in any base; or to confirm or to deny the intended use of any defence facility in connection with nuclear weapons. This policy is adopted for obvious reasons and if point is raised you must sak your unofficials to accept this; you could, however, point out that at present all that is intended is communications facilities in Diego Garcia.

PERSONAL No. 199.

My telegram No. 219, paragraph 13 (to Mauritius PERSONAL No. 198) and your telegram No. 143.

Administration of detached islands.

In discussion here with Governor Mauritius and Governor Seychelles agreement was reached on arrangements necessary under Legal, Administrative and Financial heads. These, with minor changes, have since been cleared with other interested Departments and proposed arrangements are set out in subsequent paragraphs which inter alls provide answers to questions raised in your telegram under reference.

- Legal.
- (a) Chagos to be detached by amendment of section 90(1) of Mauritius Constitution Order in Council 1964 to include reference to dependencies by name. Consequential amendment to Mauritius Interpretation and General Clauses Ordinance. Detachment of Aldabra Desroches Farquhar by suitable amendments to Letters Patent.
- Separate territory to be established by Order in Council similar to British Antarctic Territory Order in Council 1962. Under this a representative of Her Majesty would be appointed (referred to for convenience below as Commissioner although some other title may eventually be chosen). The Commissioner would be the same person as the Governor, Seychelles and would under the Order in Council have power to make laws.
- Seychelles law to apply $\underline{\text{mutatis mutandis}}$ in detached islands including Chagos archipelago. (c)
- For Diego Garcia we shall have to decide in consultation with Americans, Ministry of Defence and Governor how cases involving British or American service personnel will be handled. Until such personnel arrive (and indefinitely in other detached islands) Commissioner could by law or administrative action provide for magisterial powers of island managers to continue and for Seychelles courts to (a) try cases when necessary. By arrangement with Mauritius Government he could ensure that Mauritius magistrates continued to visit Diego Garcia and other Chages islands as in past, pending alternative arrangements.

Administrative.

- (a) General. Administration in detached islands not immediately required for defence purposes to be neither better nor worse then at present in short term, including continuation of secondment of Mauritius teachers, nurses, etc. to Chagos; in longer term any improvements should not go beyond keeping in step with what is done in other Seychelles islands.
- (b) Staff for islands. Staff required to be borrowed by Commissioner from either Mauritius (e.g. magistrates for visits to Chagos and nurses and teachers for posting there) or from Seychelles.
- (c) Resettlement
 - (i) People from Diego Garcia (and any other islands when evacuated) should be resettled in other out-islands rather than in Mauritius or Seychelles.
 - (ii) Resettlement on other detached islands to be avoided if possible.
 - (iii) Aim at resettling as many as possible of the people from Diego Garcia (and certainly the Mauritians who are "iluois") on Agalega.
 - (iv) American agreement to employ maximum number of locals on Diego Garcia during construction phase, to be sought so as to spread resettlement and so as to increase prospect of there being alternative work available in Seychelles by time any Seychellois who could not be absorbed in Agalega returned to Mahe.
- (d) Staff for Commissioner. We thought Commissioner would need one good Expatriate administrative officer plus local assistant plus supporting local staff for Commissioner and Administrative officer; local staff to be recruited in Seychelles.
- (e) No separate buildings, telegraph facilities, etc. needed for Commissioner.
- (f) Ship. Need for Commissioner to have shipping available (over and above that at present serving Seychelles islands) to enable him to administer in particular Chagos (and also handle resettlement operation) is accepted in principle. We have not yet gone into question of how this need would be met.

FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES

4. Financial.

- (a) Taxes. No taxes or duties to be raised and no development incentives to be provided by Commissioner in detached islands.
- (b) Seychelles Government to continue to derive revenue (e.g. export duty on copra and income tax from owners) in respect of detached islands; if any change required in Seychelles law to make this possible, there would be no objection to this.
- (c) Services. In return for (b) Seychelles Government to be responsible for cost of providing services on existing lines in detached islands not at once required for defence purposes (including parts of Chagos Archipelago other than Diego Garcia) e.g. as in paragraphs 2(d) and 3(b) above. In this context, as regards Chagos, you will no doubt hope to arrange as part of deal with Chagos/Agalega Company that in future they will export Chagos copra through Seychelles so that Seychelles will be able to derive export duty on it.
- (d) Costs of new services resulting from detachment operation (e.g. paragraphs 3(d) and (f) above) would be met by British Government.
- (a) Development. No (repeat no) long term incentives (e.g. tax remission for replanting) to be given by Seychelles Government in respect of detached islands not immediately needed. Short term incentives (e.g. tax holidays and fertiliser subsidies), however, could be given. Full scale (i.e. short and long term) incentives should be given to Company for development of Agalega, Seychelles law if necessary being amended to make this possible; legal advice is that fact that Agalega is Mauritius territory would not (repeat not) render such action ultra vires.
- (f) Compensation to island owners. Importance is attached to compensation being fixed at time of detachment on basis of existing assets and not (repeat not) at time island is required for defence use. Ideal arrangement from point of view of H.W.G. would be for actual payment only to be made when islands required for defence use. We recognise however that, at any rate as regards Moulinié and Chagos/Agalega Company, as we should be seeking co-operation from them e.g. over resettlement on Agalega and point in (c) above, we may have to envisage including in package deal with them (which will in any case be necessary) agreement to pay compensation on detachment and arrangements for continued running of islands not immediately needed (a lease back of islands from Commissioner to Company on short term basis on economic terms and on basis that any future development was at lessee's

- 5. We hope above provides sufficient guidance for purposes of initial discussions of defence proposals in Executive Council and with Moulinie; there is no objection to any of these matters being discussed with them (you should however, stress that title of Commissioner is used only for convenience see parenthesis in paragraph 2(b) above). In brtef our idea is that in islands not immediately needed for defence purposes there should be smallest possible disturbance of existing arrangements.
- 6. One other point arises. We have noted Newton's arguments for transfer of Agalega to Seychelles. We do not, however, wish to complicate detachment operation by ourselves raising this issue. Rennie thinks it possible that it may arrise during his talks with Mauritius Ministers. If so we can of course consider it at same time as but as separate exercise from detachment operation.

The

The Department of External Affairs are thin on the ground this month (cottage time and summons by Mr. Martin to his bedside in Windsor) but yesterday I saw the Acting Head of the Commonwealth Division, Mr. Beattie, to carry out the instructions in C.R.O. telegram No. 61 Savings about defence interests in the Indian Ocean. I had previously consulted my opposite number in the United States Embassy and had agreed with him that I should speak for his Mission as well as ours.

- 2. I handed Mr. Beattie a bout de papier describing the current proposals as set out in C.R.O. telegram No. 60 Savings and giving the facts about the islands in question as in C.R.O. telegram No. 62 Saving. I emphasised the strategic importance of the proposed development of joint user facilities in the Indian Ocean and expressed the hope of the British and United States Governments that if there were international criticism, e.g. at the United Nations, the Canadian attitude would be sympathetic and helpful.
- 3. Mr. Beattle said he was confident that the Canadian Government would not question the strategic value from the western point of view of what was proposed. He thought, however, that there might well be a great hullabaloo at the United Nations and Canada would have to consider carefully how best she could help us if that were so. He was speaking without briefing but he seemed to recall that Canada had been specially associated with a resolution at the United Nations some years ago condemning the transfer of sovereignty of any part of a state without the consent of the inhabitants. The Department of External Affairs would be grateful for more information about how consultation with Mauritius and the Seychelles would be conducted. Would the Legislative Assembly of Mauritius and the Legislative Council of the Seychelles be consulted and if so were the inhabitants of the islands ear-marked for detachment directly represented in those bodies? Had Dir we contemplated some method of direct consultation with the inhabitants of the islands in question? Satisfactory answers to these questions might well make it easier for Canada to help us at the United Nations. I pointed out that the populations involved were very small and, in the case of the Chagos Archipelago were "mostly contract labour from Mauritius and the Seychelles". This might mean that their real homes were in Mauritius and the Seychelles and that they only went in the Chagos Archipelago for brief contract periods, not for permanent residence. I promised to make inquiries about this and to ask you for any further information you could give us at this stage to answer Mr. Beattie's queries and to help reassure the Canadians that if they stood up for us in this at the United Nations they would not be open to accusation that they were going back on any resolution to which they had earlier put their hand. I shall be grateful to know what more I can say to the Department of External Affairs.

2. Dislike of detachment was expressed both by Premier and Duval though I explained this was regarded as essential. It was clear however that any attempt to detach without agreement would provoke strong protest.

3. Premier raised the question of mineral or other valuable rights that might arise in future and considered the interests of Mauritius must be safeguarded. He also referred to reversion to Mauritius if use for defence purposes shandoned.

i. Interest was shown in the project as bargaining counter for the benefit of Mauritius but no indication was given of intention to use for party advantage. I was asked whether I had any idea of the compensation contemplated. I replied that clearly difficult to assess and you had asked me to sound them on the point. Ministers mentioned the porability of the American augar quota and referred to press speculation on the amount of compensation. I said that the sugar quots would raise difficult issue, and that lump num payment would be favoured, and that exaggerated ideas whould not be entertained since there was limit to the amount the British Government would think it worth paying for the facility.

26 July, 1965

Thank you for your letter (1199/40/65) of 14 July about defence facilities on the 'ndian Ocean islands. We have asked the Colonial Office to reply direct to the list of questions in paragraph 5. (You will already have seen Colonial Office telegram no. 222 to Seychelles repeated Personal No. 199 to Wauritius which dealt with some of these questions).

Questions).

2. We agree (your paragraph 4) that if something has to be said in the U.N. it will need to go further than the statement in your telegram No. 1113 of 13 Mey, which is out of date. The facts as we know them and all the arguments we have been able to think up to explain and defend this project are contained in the C.R.O. telegrams to which you refer and our telegram No. Guidence 297 of 16 July as amended by the Corrigendum of 20 July. It is impossible to define the scope of the proposals more precisely. In essence, we want to take up nov a political option = the detachment of the islands - in order to have real estate available for defence purposes in (ssy) five or ten years time. The only immediate facility planned is a U.S. Communication state on Diego Carcia. We cannot say now exactly what more we will want to build or when, but we believe that it will get progressively more difficult to detach the islands if Mauritius gets nearer to independence and impossible to do so if she becomes full independent. Similar considerations apply, though less strongly, to the Seychelles.

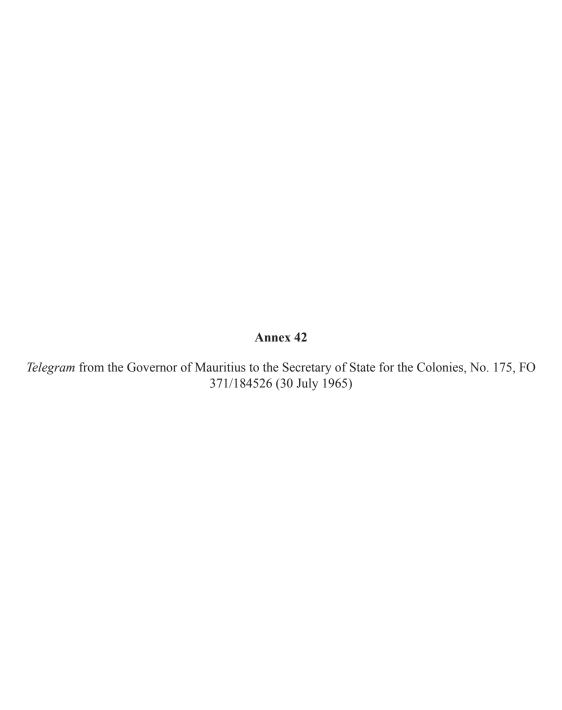

- 3. Unless this becomes essential we would much prefer not to take an initiative in the U.N. nor to make a formal statement. Your letter suggests that you think we can svoid this and may not have to answer criticism until the autumn. Much will depend on the reactions and discretion the governments to whom we have spoken and we should know more of this next week.
- h. We would prefer not to give you detailed instructions until we see how the initial approaches are received and how any criticism develops. But by all means concert with the U.S. Rission a line based on the information in paragraphs 1 and 1 8 of C.R.O. telegram W Circular 60, using the arguments in the other telegrams under reference and in F.O. Guidance tel. no. 297 as a precautionary measure.
- 5. I am sending copies of this letter to those who received yours.

Your telegram Personal No. 204.

U.K./U.S. Defence Interests.

At meeting of the Council of Ministers today the Premier speaking for the Ministers as a whole, said that they were sympathetically disposed to the request and prepared to play their part in the defence of the Commonwealth and the free world. They would like any agreement over the use of Diego Garcia to provide also for the defence of Mauritius.

2. Ministers objected however to detachment which would be unacceptable to public opinion in Mauritius. They therefore asked that you consider "with sympathy and understanding" how U.K./U.S. requirements night be reconciled with the long term least e.g. for 99 years. They wished also that provision should be made for Safeguarding mineral rights to Mauritius and ensuring preference for Mauritius if fishing or agricultural rights were ever granted. Meteorological and air inavigation facilities should also be assured to Mauritius.

As regards compensation for Mauritius they suggested the United States might purchase annually from Mauritius 300,000 to 400,000 tons of sugar at the Commonwealth negotiated price against the purchase by Mauritius from the United States of 75,000 tons of rice at about £10/41 per ton c.i.f. and 50,000 tons of wheat at about £25 per ton. American market for up to 20,000 tons of theat at about £25 per ton. American market for up to 20,000 tons of the states of frozen tuna would also be of interest. United States might also be helpful about immigration. In addition there should be capital sum towards development. They also hoped that some use might be made of Mauritius labour in construction.

4. Premier suggested there should be discussion with representatives of British and American Governments either on the occasion of or before the September conference.

5. These views were subscribed to by all the Ministers present (only Ringadoo and Forget were absent) with reservation by Bisscondoyal that he would object to use as "nuclear base". On this point I took the line laid down in paragraph 10 of your telegram Fersonal No. 198. Ministers appreciated that Kauritius Government might be criticised for acquiescing in the project but were prepared to accept this consequence. (I said all criticism from outside need not be taken at face value and they agreed).

6. I told Ministers I would report their views to you. Attitude to detachment is awkward but not unexpected despite my warning that lease would not be acceptable. Proposals for compensation are also highly inconvenient though Ministers are setting sights high in the hope of doing the best for Mauritius. I should like to emphasise, however, that apart from the regrettable leak (which is the fault of one Minister at the most) Ministers have taken responsible line and given collective view after consultation among themselves, and that so far there has been no attempt to exploit for party advantage with a view to constitutional conference. I hope also that inclusion of some element of trade in compensation will be seriously considered.

7. You may wish to repeat to Governor Seychelles for his information. (Repeated to Seychelles as C.O. tel No. 242).

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS OFFICE, DOWNING STREET, 8.W.1.

2 August, 1965

Thank you for your letter 344/1 of 22 July about the reactions of the Canadians to our proposals for certain islands in the Indian Ocean. I have consulted the Colonial Office on Mr. Beattie's queries. They have replied as follows.

The legal position is that no part of the Chagos Archipelago is included in any electoral constituency for the Legislative Assembly of Mauritius. The islands of Aldabra, Desroches and Farquhar, however, are parts of a constituency of the Legislative Council of Seychelles, and their elected member is also a member of the Executive Council. At the moment, however, this member happens to be on a six-months' leadership training course in the United States (he is a young man of 25 years of age - and very pro- American we are told). The Colonial Office are considering whether, and if so how, he might be consulted.

As yet the Governor of Mauritius and the Acting Governor of Seychelles have been instructed to consult only the Council of Ministers and the Executive Council respectively. These consultations are on a strictly confidential basis (see para 9 of our W Circular 60 Saving) and there has therefore been no question at this stage of consultation with the legislatures. At a later stage, however, debates in the legislatures will no doubt take place. We are grateful to Mr. Beattie for drawing attention to the importance of timing in this connection, and indeed for his other comments also.

This is really only an interim reply to the questions raised in your letter, but I hope they may be helpful. The detailed arrangements and procedures to be followed after we have received the views of the Mauritius Council of Ministers and the Serchelles Executive Council, are still being worked out here. We will certainly keep you in touch so that you can keep the Department of External Affairs fully briefed.

Copies of this letter go to all recipients of yours.

U.K./U.S. Defence Interests.

I should be grateful if you would inform Ministers that I much appreciate their willingness to co-operate and am gratified to know that the proposals outlined in your telegram have been made by the Council after careful and independent deliberation by Ministers themselves.

2. Please explain to Ministers that the United States Government has maintained throughout our discussions with them that the islands chosen for the development of defence facilities must be made available directly by Her Majesty's Government and that a leasehold arrangement would not do. We realise that Ministers might have difficulty over the public reactions to detachment; but we believe that any leasehold arrangements would make Mauritius Ministers vulnerable to accusations of harbouring "foreign bases".

3. Such accusations might prove extremely troublesome to Mauritius Ministers both internationally and domestically, as long as the lease continued. Outright detachment would avoid this. It is therefore the arrangement favoured by H.M.O. and is also in what we believe to be in the best interests of Mauritius.

Mauritius.

4. If on reconsideration Ministers are prepared to accept detachment, recognizing that it is the only acceptable arrangement, Her Majesty's Government will do their utaost in negotiations with the United States Government to secure what they can of the various benefits indicated in your telegram. You should however warm Ministers that the chances of success are reduced by the fact that some of the suggestions involve difficult issues of deseate politics in the United States. You might invite them to discuss other elements of compensation within the direct power of Her Majesty's Government to grant and explain that the way regard to the United States Government's and explain that the entire cost of construction of any defence facilities to be provided, any attempt to insist upon such contributions chuld prejudice the proposals as a whole. Equally, of course, M.M.G. will have to consider carefully whether they could meet whatever bids for compensation your Ministers may decide to make.

IMMEDIATE

On the 7th September the Mauritius constitutional conference will open in London.

- 2. The conference is expected to deal with two main topics. Mrst, it will discuss the long-term future status of the inland; and secondly, it will, we hope, agree that Mauritius should go forward within the next few months to internal self-government. The Mauritian political parties are divided over the question of long-term status. Some are desanding independence within the Commonwealth; others look to some form of continued association with Eritain. We doubt whether it will be possible for the conference to resolve these differences, but it night succeed in arriving at definitions of "independence" and "free association" which could in due course be put to the Mauritius electroate, and in deciding that the future status of the island should depend on the outcome of an election or a referendum.
- We know that, whatever the long-term views of the parties, all are doeply concerned about defence and internal security. All fully recognize:
 - (a) that Hauritius will be virtually unable to provide for its own defence against any determined external attack; and
 - Our defence against any determined external actual; and

 (b) that, when Kauritius Ministers assume responsibility for internal security, attuations may arise in which the Government of the day will need external assistance in the form of troops. The prospect of building up the existing Special (Mohile) Force of 150 policemen trained in the use of infantry small arms to the extent that would be required (in theory) to make any need for external forces unnecessary in an emergency is not very attractive, particularly because it would be difficult or impossible in a society rent with occurrent building the could be fully relied upon in the kind of communal trouble to be expected.
- 4. We know that Sir Seewoosagur Easgoolam, the Prenier and leader of the Mauritius Labour Party, which wants independence within the Commonwealth, hopes to negotiate a defence treaty with Eritain, and we must also expect that he will seek an undertaking from Her Hajesty's Government to come to the assistance of the Government of Mauritius with British troops in the event of - a serious internal threat. You will have seen from the Governor's Personal telegram No. 175 that the Premier has informed him that his Ministers "would like any agreement over the use of Diego Garcia to provide also for the defence of Mauritius".

- 5. We are now engaged in preparing briefs for Ministers for the September conference. One of the most important of these must deal with defence and internal security so far as the latter involves the use of British forces.
- 6. Our Secretary of State's basic policy is, of course, to arrive at a constitutional formula for each territory that will (a) reconcile conflicting party policies about the future status of the territory; (b) ensure law and order; (c) satisfy international opinion so far as possible. Whilet Nauritius is a comparatively law-shiding and senselle place, to apply the basic policy there is not easy. The chances of success, we feel, will depend very largely on the firmness of the statements which the Secretary of State is able to make when crucial questions are put to him in the course of the conference. In this context the most important basic consideration, we assume, is the strategic value to the British Government of the main installations the naval wireless station, H.M.S. MAURITIUS and Plaisance Airport.

nor anywhere else

- 7. Whilst current plans for developing alternative communications and staging facilities elsewhere in the Indian Ocean would presumably reduce the value of those in Mauritius, such plans are not yet firm and in any event must take some time to carry out. At the present stage, therefore, it ought presumably to be practical politics for the Secretary of State to make it clear that, wintever the outcome of the conference, Her Majesty's Government would not lightly permit any threat to internal security to prejudice the continued use of HAMAS MAURITUS or the availability of Phisance Airport as a staging post. Do you agree, and if so, in what terms from your point of view could such an assurance be given?
- 8. Whilst at the present time any substantial threats to internal security would probably cose from the right wing of Mauritius politics and would not in thesesolves appear to constitute any danger to E.M.S. MAURITUS or Plaisance Airport or to Anglo-U.S. defence plans, it must be expected that left wing, pro-communist (Chinese and Soviet) threats to internal security will inevitably become stronger in the future. Moreover, such threats are likely to be stimulated rather than subdued by the Anglo-U.S. plans.
- 9. In this cituation, if Mauritius is independent at the time when the proposed Anglo-U.S. installations in Diego Garcia and elsewhere are brought into use will Her Hajesty's Government then continue to be as concerned about the internal security of Mauritius as at the present time? If so, it would, perhaps, be helpful if the Secretary of State could say so at the conference. Whilst it will presumably be necessary for him firmly to refuse to define the hypothetical circumstances in which Britain would send troops to assist the civil power in an independent Mauritius or in a Mauritius freely associated with Britain, he should if possible be in a position to make very clear to the conference, and to any of the leaders who might question him in private, that the internal security of Mauritius is likely to be of great concern to fer Majesty's Government for an indefinite period shead - if this is the case.

10. If the internal accurity of Nauritius is to be of great concern to Her Mejesty's Government for an indefinite period ahead, it would strengthen the ergument for a defence agreement. We know, of course, that no such agreement have been made latterly with independent African states. Moreover, no external threat to Nauritius is yet apparent. But, as indicated above, the Premier has already asked that any agreement over the use of Diego Garcia should also cover the defence of Nauritius, and it must be expected that all parties will want a defence agreement with Britain and that it should contain consething about the provision of British troops for an internal security rele. We know that one of the parties demanding independence at the same time actually wants a garriage of British troops to be stationed permanently in the inland. It seems to us that there is probably no great rink involved in having a defence agreement. Do you agree? What line can we take about this in briefing the Secretary of State?

- 11. I am sorry to trouble you with so long a letter. But, as you will understand, the success of the constitutional conference is likely to turn very largely on the line the Secretary of State takes when dealing with the points I have raised. We must, if possible, have the briefs at least in first draft inside the next fortnight. I should, therefore, be most grateful if you could let me have your advice as soon as possible.
- 12. I should like to conclude with a warming that, if the Secretary of State is able to make only vegue noises when dealing with some of these questions, it may well turn out to be impossible for Mauritius to advance from the status of dependency at all, with the consequences that all the existing defence countiments in respect of the island will have to remain intact. A decision to perpetuate them in substance, whatever the future status of Mauritius, therefore, may not involve any material alteration to the position that would otherwise obtain.
- 13. If you will give me a ring we can consider whether to have a meeting about this or whether you would prefer to write.
- 14. I am sending copies of this to Morland at the Foreign Office, Champion at the C.R.O. and Patterson at the Treasury who will, no doubt, comment if they wish.

MAURITIUS CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

INTRODUCTION

- The Mauritius consitutional conference will open in London on 7th September 1965. The Colonial Office are preparing briefs for Ministers, one of which will deal with defence and internal security, in so far as the latter involves the use of British forces.
- The Colonial Office have asked (1) for a military view on certain points and the Defence Secretariat have consolidated these into the four following questions, on which they have asked our views:
 - a. To what extent should we undertake to assist hauritius over internal security after independence?
 - b. To what extent should we undertake to assist Mauritius over external defence after independence, the form of a defence agreement (bearing in mind the possible development of Anglo-American facilities on islands whose future still has to be negotiated with Mauritius and Seychelles)?
 - c. What assurance can we give about our continued use of the neval wireless station (MMS Kauritius) and of Plaicance Airport for steging purposes, either in public or privately, to Mauritius leaders?
 - d. Should we offer to help in building up the Special (Mobile) Force so that it can play a larger part in controlling internal security?

3. To answer the questions asked by the Defence Secretariat. BACKGROUND

Strategic Importance of Mauritius

4. We have previously stated (2) that there are two major facilities in Hauritius which are most important to British strategy. These are:

a. The Naval and Strategic Wireless Station (HMS Mauritius). This is required to provide:

- (1) Command and control of Commonwealth naval and merchant shipping in the Indian Ocean, Arabian Sea, and Persian Gulf.
- (2) A link in our defence strategic communications to the Middle-East, Far East, and South Africa, and as a link into the United States defence communications network.

b. The Airfield at Flaisance. This is required as a valuable, and in some cases essential, staging post between the Middle East and Central Africa for Tac T (ME) aircraft, should staging or overlying in East Africa be denied. It could also become an essential airfield on the proposed reinforcement route to the Middle and Far East, flying round or over Southern Africa.

5. Any alternative to either of these facilities might take three to five years to construct.

US/UK Defence Interests in the Indian Ocean

- 6. In February 1964 it was agreed at official level that the United States should, at their own expense, develop certain defence facilities in the Indian Ocean which could also be used by the United Kingdom if HM Government made the islands concerned available. As a result of subsequent surveys the Americans have plans for the early construction of a communications station and facilities, including an eirstrip, on Diego Gercia, one of the islands in the Chagos Archipelago which is a dependency of Mauritius.
- 7. The matter was considered (3) by Ministers last April, and the Colonial Office subsequently instructed (4) the Governor of Mauritius to inform his Ministers that, subject to the agreement of the Government of Nauritius, HE Government would be prepared in principle to pursue the proposed detachment of the whole of the Chagos Archipelago (including Diego Gercia) for the purpose of joint development with the Americans.
- 8. Discussions with the United States, Mauritius, and Seychelles are continuing. The islands earmarked for detachment from Mauritius are the Chagos Archipelago, including Diego Garcia. The islands which it is proposed to detach from the Seychelles are Aldabra, Farquhar, and Desroches.

QUESTIONS TO BE ANSWERED

Question a. To what extent should we undertake to assist Mauritius over internal security after independence?

9. There is an existing plan (5) to introduce up to one infantry battalion group into Mauritius for internal security duties if required and, subject to the current defence review, we expect to continue to have this capability. However, the extent, if any, to which HM Government should agree to provide British military assistance to meintain public order in Mauritius after full independency is primarily a political question. Although we have in c.rtain case taken military action at the request of the government consumed or make plane to do no, we have no formal commitments of this kind towards other independent Commencealth countries except Heltz.

10. It would be very much in our interests to be able to use British forces to assist the local authorities in dealing with threats to the functioning of the sirrield at Plaisance or of the Naval and strategic wireless station, HMS MUBITIUS. Such action would be facilitated both politically and militarily if we had a formal agreement to assist Mauritius in internal security.

11. On the other hand, it would be undesirable for us to be permanently committed to intervene in communal disorders at the behest of the Government of a genuinely independent Mauritius. Such a commitment might involve us in deploying to Mauritius forces more urgently needed elsewhere quite apart from incurring the odium of backing one community alternately against the other. Consequently, we believe that any internal security commitment that we accept in order to help to secure agreement to the excision of the Chagos Archipelago should be limited in time to the period during which we have defence facilities in Mauritius, and in scope to assistance to the local authorities in the protection of our facilities and of essential public utilities.

Question b. To what extent should we undertake to assist Mauritius over external defence after independence, in the form of a defence agreement (bearing in mind the possible development of Anglo-American facilities on islands whose future still has to be negotiated with Mauritius and Seychelles)?

12. We are advised that the conclusion of a defence agreement with a newly independent Commonwealth country is generally speaking undesirable. Furthermore, the acceptance of any more defence agreements at a time when our world-wide commitments are under review should be avoided unless there is an overriding political or military advantage to be gained.

13. While there are certain external communist influences at work in Mauritius, we can at present foresee no likely external military threat to either Mauritius or its dependencies. However, the Governor of Mauritius has reported (1) that the Premier has informed him that his Ministers "would like any agreement over the use of Diego Garcia to provide also for the defence of Mauritius".

14. We would much prefer that the detachment of Diego Garcia and the other dependencies from Mauritius should, once the compensation terms have been agreed, proceed without any consequential military commitment for the external defence of Mauritius. However, if Mauritius Ministers make detachment of the dependencies or retention of our staging facilities and wireless station conditional on an external defence agreement we should or state of the

agree, since we would not like our plans for the development of US/UK defence interests or retention of our existing facilities in the Indian Ocean to founder on this point; however, the commitment need not necessarily be in the form of a formal Defence Agreement.

5. We are advised that a defence agreement covering only external defence would not satisfy Mauritius Ministers, and that a defence agreement covering internal security and not external defence is unlikely to be politically acceptable to them. We therefore consider that in spite of the disadvantages it would, on balance, be in our interests to enter into a defence agreement covering both internal security and external defence if this was the only way we could ensure the retention and safeguarding of our facilities and the successful outcome of our negotiations to detach the Chagos Archipelego. Such an agreement would obviously cease to be of any advantage to us once the negotiations for detachment had been completed or if in due course we had ceased to retain our facilities for any reason.

Cuestion c. What assurance can we give about our continued use of the navel wireless station (HMS MAURITIUS) and of Platsance Airport for staging purposes, either in public or privately, to Mauritius leaders?

- 16. There will be a naval requirement for communications facilities on the present scale in Mauritius for as far ahead as can be foreseen.
- 17. Similarly the airfield at Plaisance will continue to be a valuable, and in some cases essential, staging post, particularly if use of routes round or over southern Africa is developed. Even in the event of an airfield being built on Aldabra, Plaisance would continue to provide a useful alternative and we would wish to retain the facilities for staging aircraft through there in an emergency.
- 18. We should therefore assure the Mauritius Government that we foresee a continuing use for both facilities. There would be no objection to this being stated publicly.

Question 4. Should we offer to help in building up the Special (Mobile) Force so that it can play a larger part in controlling internal security?

19. We consider that the proper way for Mauritius to maintain a satisfactory internal security situation is to build up the Special (Mobile) Force so that it can adequately cope with any foreseen eventuality. Although it might be assumed that the country has the shility and will to control its own affairs, since self-government in the near future is being considered, we are advised that the communal situation in Mauritius presents special problems in building up a reliable internal security force. Nevertheless a strong police force would ensure that British troops were less likely to be called on for internal security. Therefore we should be prepared to offer any necessary training assistance for this force on the understanding that its cost would not fall on the Ministry of Defence vote.

The Committee had before them a paper (1) by the Defence Planning Staff and a Secretary's minute (2) covering a draft Defence and Oversea Policy Committee (OPD) paper.

(OFD) paper.

SIR RICH/RE HULL said that the Colonial Secretary had not been able to persuade the Mauritian Ministers to agree to the detechment from hauritius of Diego Garcia and the other islands of the Chagos Archipelsgo, in the context of the proposed development of Anglo/American military facilities in the Indian Ocean, in advance of the Hauritius Constitutional Conference, which would open in London on 7th September 1955. Thus, at the conference, defence and internal security issues were expected to assume perticular importance. The report by the Defence Planning Staff answered four specific questions on points of Lefence policy relating to Mauritius posed by the Colonial Office. The Defence Secretarist had prepared a Arct OFD paper seeking to establish the importance of having joint UK/US military facilities in the Chagos Archipelago in relation to the other issues of defence policy towards Mauritius.

This OPD paper had been drafted in consultation with the Foreign Office, at official level, as a joint submission by the Deputy Secretary of State for Defence and the Minister of State for Foreign Affeirs. It was important that it should be considered by the Defence and Oversea Policy Committee at their meeting on Tuesday Jist August 1965, as this would be the lest opportunity for Ministers to consider the matter before the Constitutional Conference.

Both the DP paper and the draft OPD paper were in general agreement, but in the draft OPD paper a different line had been taken on guarantees for Mauritian internal security. In considering Gefence arrangements and the internal security problem, the DP paper concluded that we could guarantee the external defence of Mauritius once the island became genuinely independent and, because of our navel establishment there, we might in the worst case accept certain responsibilities for internal security. On the other hand, the OPD paper, whilst also accepting the commitment for external defence, only allowed for the protection of our own forces and facilities, and argued against our becoming involved in an internal security role. The Committee would wish to hear the views of representatives of political departments.

Part I to COS 43rd Meeting/65 24th Jugust 1965

MR SMITH (Colonial Office) outlined the present position in Mauritius and the possible outcome of the Constitutional Conference. The island was divided into two basic communities: the Indians and the Creeles. The Prime Minister, an Indian, was eiming to achieve independence for Mauritius whilst retaining full external defence and internal security agreements with the United Kingdom; his objective was a seat in the United Nations; he was unlikely to achieve this under such arrangements. The Creele opposition wished to retain British supervision for their protection against the Indians and were therefore siming for something less than independence. The outcome of the Conference was uncertain and his Secretary of State had stread that he was open to consider any kind of solution. The most likely course of events was that the Conference was unlikely to agree on full autonomy, but would accept that Mauritius should proceed to full internal self-government, with the possibility of further progress after a future referendum. Until that time British interests would be represented by a High Commissioner or Governor General. The Colonial Secretary was anxious to detach the Chagos Archipelago by consent and was disinclined to detach it arbitrarily by an Order in a quid pro quo for the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago and it was the opinion of the Colonial repercussions. The Mauritian Premier would press for a quid pro quo for the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago and it was the opinion of the Colonial Office that we should not get the bases by consent unless guarantees covering external defence and internal security were given.

security were given.

MR WAISH ATKINS (Commonwealth Relations Office) said that his Department generally agreed with the draft OPL paper. They were not in favour of defence agreements with COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES and agreements with regard to internal security found even less favour. In the case of Mauritius any British internal security action after full independence would have widespread repercussions in the Indian Ocean area owing to racial connections with other countries. In this connection, it was importent to differentiate between total independence and independence under "free association"; if Mauritius schieved independence in "free association" with the United Kingdom, intervention in an internal security role might be more politically acceptable. While the legal position was not clear, it was noteworthy that the view existed in Whitehall that there was a right for a state to intervene in another country to protect its own people, even if no written agreement existed. With regard to defence agreements, his department had found that their stated policy of never entering into defence agreements, though not rigidly adhered to, had proved a valuable bargaining point in such discussions.

Part I to COS 43rd Meeting/65 24th Lugust 1965

In discussion, the following points were made:

a. There was a risk that we might, under pressure, accept an indefinite responsibility for internal security in Hauritius. As the likely outcome of the conference was partial independence, in which circumstance we would still have an internal security commitment under a British High Commissioner, the paragraph in the draft OTD paper on internal security should be amended to reflect this.

b. The Foreign Office sgreed that commitments for the defence and internal security of a genuinely independent Amuritius were most undesirable, but they retrached such importance to the detachment of the islend bases that, if such agreements were the only method of achieving it, this would be considered as a special case. In their view, the presence of our nevel forces in Mauritius and our position in the Indian Ocean as a whole would make it imperative for us to accept responsibility for the external defence of Mauritius whether we were invited to do so or not.

c. The navel communications station on Maunitius was a main centre for all navel communications East of Suez. As such it was of vital importance to the Many and a station of this sort would remain so as long as forces were required to operate East of Suez; it was therefore essential that we should retain the right to protect it. The station had cost £5m to build and, whilst it was technically possible for it to be re-installed elsewhere, the financial penalty would be of the same order. order.

- d. The Air Porce Jop rument considered that the provision of the island bases in the Chapos Archipelage was of such importance to our future strategy in the Indian Ocean that we should, if forced, accept whatever external defence or internal security commitments were necessary to ensure their detechment.
- e. Several minor amendments to both the droft OPD paper and the DP paper were agreed.

Summing up, SIR RICHER HULL said that the Committee would agree with the Foreign Office that it was a matter of prime impertance that the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago from Reunitius should be achieved before any moves towards Mauritian independence, whether partial or complete, were agreed. It might be necessary for a commitment for the internal security of Mauritius to be accepted-during the period of internal self-government short of full independence, but they wished at all costs to avoid a commitment to assist a genuinely independent member of the Commonwealth in controlling her own affeirs, especially when that country had racial problems of a particularly difficult kind. The papers before them, as amended in the light of their discussion, would serve to define their objectives with regard to Kauritien independence. Report by the Defence Planning Staff

In accordance with the instructions (1) of the Chief of the Defence Staff we have answered the following four questions posed by the Defence Secretariat:

- a. To what extent should we undertake to assist Mauritius over internal security after independence?
- b. To what extent should we undertake to assist Mauritius over external defence after independence, in the form of a defence agreement (bearing in mind the possible development of Anglo-American facilities on islands whose future still has to be negotiated with Mauritius and Seychelles)?
- c. What assurance can we give about our continued use of the navel wireless station (HAS Mauritius) and of Plaisance Airport for staging purposes, either in public or privately, to Mauritius leaders?
- d. Should we offer to help in building up the Special (Mobile) Force so that it can play a larger part in controlling internal security?
- We have consulted the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office, the Defence Secretariat, and the Defence Signal Staff. Our report is is at Annex.

DEFENCE AND OVERSEA POLICY COMMITTEE

DEFENCE FACILITIES IN THE INDIAN OCEAN

Memorandum by the Deputy Secretary of State for Defence and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs

We are both much concerned with the urgency of obtaining further decisions on the proposed detechment of certain islands from Mauritius and Seychelles for the military purposes of the United States and ourselven. The islands in question are Diego Garcia and the rest of the Chagos Archipelago (which belong to Mauritius); and Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches(which belong to Seychelles). The only island for which immediate plans exist is Diego Garcia, where the Royal Navy have plans to establish an oil fuel depot (to replace that in Ceylon), and where the Americans wish to build a communications station with supporting facilities. Details of the proposals were given in OFP(6)66, which the Communication of April 12th.

- meeting on April 12th.

 2. At that meeting the Committee agreed in principle to pursue the proposal further, and that the price we might have to pay should be discussed with the Governments in Nauritius and Seychelles. As a result, the Governmor of Mauritius has explained the situation to his Ministers, and the Governor of Seychelles to his Executive Council, and sought their reactions. The Seychelles Executive Council was lukewarn but reised no objection of principle. They thought that construction of a civil airfield on Mahe would be satisfactory compensation. Mauritius Ministers are reported to be sympathetically disposed, but they have reised a number of difficulties. In particular, they wish any agreement over the use of Diego Garcia to provide also for the defence of Mauritius; they would prefer a 99-year lease instead of detachment under permanent UI sovereignty; they suggest a greatly increased US sugar quota for Mauritius (and hope that the United States might also be helpful about immignation); and they mention an inspectified capital sum for development.
- 3. The Mauritius Constitutional Conference opens in London on September 7th. Although there is much to be said for keeping constitutional and defence questions apart, and for dealing with islands as a separate affair, Mauritius leaders have asked to discuss the matter while in London. Moreover, we understand that, in discussing the ultimate status of Mauritius (independence or somethin; short of it), Mauritian politicins are likely to be specially interested in the extent to which Britian is prepared to.remain responsible for their external defence and their internal security. This being so, the line taken by the Colonial Secretary with Mauritius leaders at the Conference on future defence arrangements will profoundly affect our chances of carrying them with us in the proposed detachment of Diego Garcia and the Chagos Archipelago. If we fail to persuade them now, we may never again be in a position to do so at an acceptable cost. Indeed if Nauritius opts for independence at this conference, this will be our last chance to secure the Chagos Archipelago.

4. We should like at this stage to underline the arguments set out by the Foreign Secretary and the Defence Secretary in their earlier paper (OPD(65)68). In the summing up of the discussion, the minutes of the OPD(65)21st Meeting record:

In the studies on future strategy now being prepared for the Defence Review, it is assumed that these islands will be available in the long term. Recent events in Singapore have given a new urgency to these considerations. We regard the perpetuation of British sovereignty over the islands as extremely important both for their potential strategic value and because they are essentially a joint investment with the Americans. Moreover, if we fail to secure the islands now, the Americans will have neither the inclination nor the means to give us cooperation and logistic support which we shall need in the area.

- 5. We turn now to the terms on which we can still get these islands. The main ingredients, as suggested by Ministers in Mauritius and Seychelles, are considered below:
 - and Seychelles, are considered below:Lease. The Americans have said at official level that it is extremely unlikely that the United States would want to go through with the deal unless the islands were to be permanently detached. Since we see the Americans as an essential partner we must regard American views against a lease as decisive. Moreover, any lease agreement is bound to bring Mauritius under very strong Afro-Asian pressure to revise it in due course. Although in possession of the islands we should be fully entitled and able to resist such pressure, it would novertheless bedevil our relations with Mauritius and provide a continuing excuse for hostile powers to make trouble. We should therefore stick to the original proposal for detaching the islands once and for all and placing them under
 - Sugar. This, of course, is for the Americans to decide, but we have strong reason to believe that they will find it impossible to ge more than a very short way to meet the Mauritius bid. b.
 - Finance. At their meeting on April 12th the Committee agreed that the United States Government should be asked to contribute to the cost of compensating Mauritus and Seychelles for the loss of their islands. The US Government have recently replied that they are prepared in principle to provide a contribution to the detachment costs, up to one half of the roughly estimated £10m. total, through deduction of an agreed amount of UK payments due in research and development surcharges. American officials are thinking of R and D costs of the Polaris programme for this purpose, but we have not yet received detailed proposals from them. Despite discussions in Mauritius and Seychelles, no precise estimate can yet be made of the overall cost of development aid, buying out the commercial owners of the islands and resettling the inhabitants. Nevertheless, the American offer is a clear advance on the original basis on which the project was discussed with them, namely that the UK would pay for the construction of the facilities they required, and give us joint use. We believe that the American offer is the best we can hope for and that, although the costs are still unknown, we should tell the Seychelles that we are prepared to pay about £3million towards the cost of an unsophisticated civil airfield, Mauritius being offered aid for some suitable project at no greater cost than Seychelles, An immediate offer to Mauritius should help to overcome any disappointment over their other demands.

- d. External Defence. Normally, we are unwilling to enter into formal arrangements for the external defence of newly independent Commonwealth countries. We should only undertake an obligation in return for a clear-cut political and strategic benefit. In this case, in return for accepting an obligation which we are extremely unlikely ever to be called upon to meet, we stand to gain the advantages already referred to. We therefore propose that, if it seems essential to secure Mauritian acceptance, we should offer, perhaps in a confidential memorandum of understanding, to be responsible for the future defence of an independent Mauritius on condition that Mauritius agrees now to transfer the Chagos Archipelago to British sovereignty.
- chagos Archipelago to British sovereignty.

 e. Internal Security. Internal trouble appears a more real danger in Mauritius than external attack. If Mauritius remains a British dependency, we shall anyhow be responsible for internal security. We see serious objection, however, to being obliged to assist any genuinely independent member of the Commonwealth in controlling her own affairs, especially when that country has racial problems of a particularly difficult kind. Indeed, restoring order in an internal security situation might well take the form of backing one community against the other, according to the Government in power at the time. We believe this situation should be firmly avoided, and that we should press on with detaching the islands without getting curselves involved in an internal security commitment to an independent Mauritius. If our agreement to accept some obligation to assist in internal security should turn out to be the only way of securing Mauritian acceptance of the detachment of Chagos, we should consider it in the context of a status short of genuine independence (in which case the obligation might indeed be held to romain anyway); thereafter, in the event of genuine independence, we should limit our commitment both in time and scope, tying it to the period of the continued use of our existing military facilities on Maurițius (a naval wireless station and a staging airfield) and limiting it to the protection of these facilities and of essential public utilities.

Conclusions

- 6. a. Perpetuation of British sovereignty over the islands is extremely important, both for their potential strategic value and because they will be a joint investment with the Americans.
 - b. As negotiation in Mauritius has failed to establish agreement on terms, we regard it as essential that, during their stay in London, Mauritius Ministers should be made aware of HMG's determination to go through with this project on terms which in HMG's view adequately compensate Mauritius for the loss of the remote and neglected Chagos Archipelago.
 - c. These terms should be financial compensation for Mauritius in the form of development or other aid comparable to the sum of about 23million to be offered to the Sevenchles, plus a promise of continued British responsibility for the external defence of Mauritius, only as a last resort should we indicate willingness to commute ourselves to assist in internal security after full independence, and then we should limit our commitment to the period of the continued use of our existing defence facilities in Mauritius itself and to the protection of these and of essential public utilities.
 - d. If Mauritius Hinisters refuse this offer, they should be told that, in that case, HMG will have to consider any proposals for the future status of Mauritius without the Chagos archipelago, and will exercise their right to transfer Chagos to permanent British sovereighty under order-incouncil, financial compensation as above being paid to the Mauritius Government.
 - e. With Seychelles we should press on with arrangements for the detachment of Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches, in return for subsidising unsophisticated civil airfield on Mahe up to a limit of about £3million.
 - f. We should accept the US Government's offer to repay us half the costs of detachment and should invite their urgent views on how payment should be made.

Recommendation

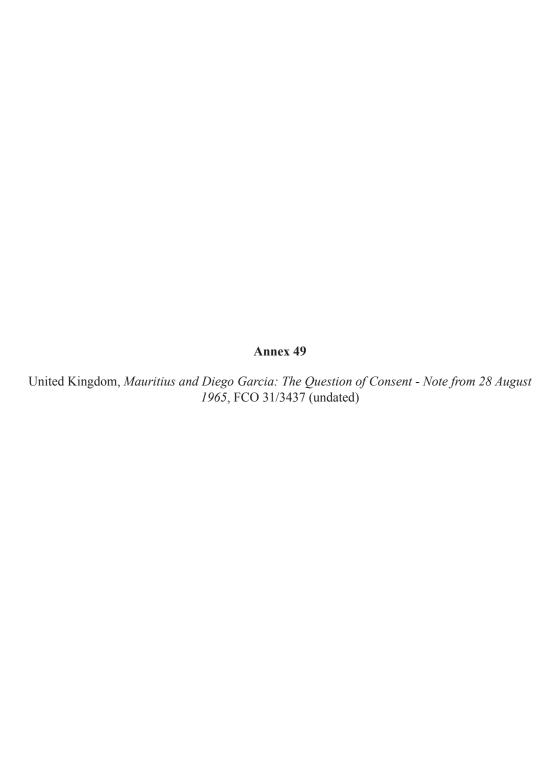

7. We invite our colleagues to endorse the conclusions in para. 6 above.

The attached joint Foreign Office/Ministry of Defence paper was approved by Lord Walston in the absence of the Secretary of State. It is to be discussed at the Defence Overses Policy Committee next Tuesday immediately after the paper on Singapore with which it has a logical connection.

- 2. The Secretary of State will be familiar with the background to this proposal which has now been under negotiation for 18 months. The back history, a description of the islands concerned, and a map are included in the earlier joint paper (OFD 65/68 of 7
- 3. The Mauritius conference, which opens in London on 7 Setember, may be our last chance to achieve a satisfactory outcome. Even if Mauritius does not opt for full independence at this conference and it seems unlikely that she wide do so it is unlikely that we shall be able to keep consultations with Mauritius confidential for much longer. Widespread public discussion of the proposal before agreement had been reached would make the achievement of a successful conclusion much more difficult. A decision on how to proceed is therefore required urgently.
- lag A 4. The new joint paper marks an important step forward.

 The Foreign Office have long urged the importance of the islands project for Anglo/American relations. The /Ministry

Ministry of Defence (including the Chiefs of Staff who discussed and approved it in draft) have gone further with a statement (paragraph 4 of the paper) of the extreme importance for our own strategic purposes of detaching the islands now. In the light of this statement the paper recommends that if Mauritius Ministers refuse our offers, they should be told that in that case Her Majesty's Government will have to consider any proposals for the future status of Mauritius without the Chagos Archipelago, and will exercise their right to transfer Chagos to permanent British sovereignty under order-in-council, financial compensation being paid to the Mauritius Government in accordance with our offer. There should be no need for such pressure in connection with the islands belonging to Seychelles, provided a satisfactory bargain can be struck on the amount of compensation to be paid. 5. It is difficult to assess precisely reactions in the United Netions. Even if the islands are detached with the consent of the Seychelles and Mauritius Ministers there will be criticism at the United Nations both from those who wish on strategic grounds to exclude British influence from the Indian Ocean area and from those who have a doctrinaire or emotional hostility to "foreign bases". We must also expect the argument that adjustments of territorial boundaries cannot be recognised unless they are freely agreed by the representatives of the people concerned after independence. . New Delhi telegram 2815 of 16 August foreshedows this line from the Indians. 6. Although there is nothing in the Charter of the United Nations which forbids the adjustment of the boundaries of colonial territories, subject to observance of the principle in Article 73 (which we ourselves have frequently invoked) that the interests of the inhabitants are paramount, there are a number of United Nations resolutions which would undoubtedly be quoted against us. The most important is Resolution 1514 (the "Declaration on Colonialism"), operative paragraph 6 of which states that "any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations". Although this resolution , does not in law have the force of a Charter amendment, it is regarded as such in practice by the Afro-Asian and Communist members.

7. If the islands are detached against the expressed wishes of the inhabitants, or without their consent, then our opponents will have more plausible arguments to hand and many of our friends may hesitate to defend In these circumstances the Charter, as well as United Nations resolutions will be invoked against us. 8. We should in reply be able to point to the remoteness of the islands concerned from the main islands, with which they have been united solely for the administrative convenience of the colonial power, and not because of any historic, geographic or ethnic affinity; and to the fact that the inhabitants concerned are few and nearly all contract labourers neither permanently living on, mr indigenous to, the islands they work on. We should have to argue that their detachment does not con-'flict with the interests of the inhabitants of Mauritius . /and and Seychelles as a whole.

9. We shall have to meet criticism whether or not the consent of the representatives of the inhabitants has been secured. But without it our opponents' arguments will gain a more sympathetic hearing. We must, therefore, accept the fact that we shall be subject to continuing attacks in the United Nations. These will tend, at any rate temporarily, to obscure the positive aspects of our record of decolonisation, create suspicion about our progress with other of our remaining dependencies, and complicate our relations with the Organisation as a whole, thereby making it more difficult for us to fulfil our declared sim of sustaining and strengthening it. These attacks, however, although damaging at times, will not be unmanageable. The recommendation that we should proceed with this proposal, if necessary even without local consent, is made after full consideration of these difficulties. It is becoming clear from the Defence Review that if we wish to maintain a credible military presence east of Suez, to co-operate with the Americans in the Indian Ocean area, and to keep our lines of communication open to Australia, we must have these islands. In five years time we may well have lost our bases in Aden and Singapore. The new agreement with the Maldives covering our facilities at Gan, achieved after long and difficult negotistions, does not provide for the use of these facilities by our allies. If we insisted on our allies using them the independent Maldivian Government might go back on the agreement; and in any case our enjoyment of these facilities cannot be guaranteed, the Maldives being independent, in the long term.

10. Once our Singapore base has gone, we shall depend increasingly on American (as well as Australian) logistic support and co-operation. At present the Americans are in no position to help us in the Indian Ocean area, since they have no bases, facilities or forces permanently deployed, between the Mediterranean and the Philippines. Unless we secure the islands now we cannot expect them to have either the means or the inclination to help us, either with forces or logistics, in the future.

Indian Ocean area without Singapore and Aden, we must clearly have facilities on sovereign territory between Australia and Suez. The islands which we propose to detach from Mauritius and Seychelles are well situated for peace-keeping operations East of Suez, and particularly in East, Central and Southern Africa, where our participation in United Nations operations would be essential. If we do not detach these islands now, we shall find it very difficult to maintain our rôle East of Suez in the long term.

12. It is recommended that the Secretary of State should speak on the above lines at the Defence Overses Policy Committee.

The Prime Minister, summing up the discussion, said that the Committee gave general approval to OPD (65) 123 as guidance for our officials at the forthcoming discussions with our Allies, but it must be made clear that what was said about the future level of our forces in the area was subject to the conclusions of the Defence Review. Questions of the size and cost of our future defence contribution in the area should not be raised in the paper to be prepared for circulation to our allies, which should take the form primarily of an analysis of the situation arising from the secession of Singapore and the difficulties with which we were confronted as a consequence. If our Allies raised during the discussions questions about the future level of our forces, we should make it clear that until the Defence Review was more advanced, we were not in a position to discuss the issues in more detail. We should, however, indicate orally that we looked to a sharing of the cost, and any new facilities to be established, on a co-operative basis. The official discussions could be only exploratory; opportunities for further discussion with Ministers of our Allies would be afforded by the forthcoming visits of the Foreign Secretary and of the Secretary of State for Defence to the United States and to Australia and New Zealand respectively. Meanwhile we should not invite Lee Kuan Yew to visit the United Kingdom but we should not discourage him from doing so.

Approved OPD (65) 123 subject to the points indicated in the Prime Minister's summing up, as the basis of guidance for our representatives at the forthcoming official discussions with officials from Australia, New Zealand and the United States.

2. Defence facilities in the Indian Ocea

(Previous Reference: OPD (65) 21st Meeting, Item 6)

The Committee considered a memorandum by the Deputy Secretary of State for Defence and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (OPD (65) 124) on Defence Facilities in the Indian Ocean.

The Deputy Secretary of State for Defence said that it was urgent to obtain further decisions on the proposed detachment of certain islands from Mauritius and Seychelles for the military purposes of the United States and ourselves, both because of their strategic position in the Indian Ocean and because the establishment of facilities on them was important to our relations with the United States. The agreement of the Mauritius Ministers to the transfer should be obtained if possible but in any event the decision to detach the islands should be taken before the end of the Mauritius Constitutional Conference which was about to open in London. The United States had now agreed to pay half the estimated cost of detachment of approximately £10 million. In response to the request of Mauritius Ministers we might accept responsibility for the external defence of Mauritius, but there was strong objection to our similarly accepting a continued responsibility for internal security after Mauritius became independent, since this might embroil us with opposing racial groups in the island. If agreement on the detachment of the Chagos group could not be obtained, we should nevertheless transfer them to direct United Kingdom sovereignty by Order in Council.

The Foreign Secretary said that if both the Seychelles and the Mauritius Governments agreed to our proposals, there would be no international criticism of our actions. Nevertheless, if the latter did not agree the strategic importance of the islands was sufficient to justify our passing the necessary Order in Council. Our legal right to do so was unquestioned. Moreover, the Chagos Archipelago was 1,800 miles from Mauritius and they had been grouped together some time ago only for administrative convenience: there were no ethnic or historic connections between the islands and Mauritius.

The Colonial Secretary said he was not in agreement with these proposals. The Mauritius Constitutional Conference would in any case be difficult. When the Committee had last discussed detaching the islands, they had agreed that the proposed compensation should be increased and that the agreement of the Mauritius Government was essential. Their Ministers would be very disappointed at our not agreeing to accept a 99-year lease and also if the United States did not accept their proposals on sugar. The offer to accept responsibility for their external defence would be useful in negotiations. However, our acceptance of responsibility for internal security would be the main issue. Minority guarantees would be a most important part of the conference and could probably only be satisfactorily resolved by an assurance that we would provide forces for internal security at the request of the Mauritius Government. At least we should therefore agree that a request from the Mauritius Government after independence for assistance in internal security would be sympathetically considered. Mauritius Ministers would, on this basis, probably accept the detachment of the islands but to threaten to go ahead with this by Order in Council regardless of their agreement would undoubtedly wreck the conference.

In discussion the following points were made:

- (a) In the negotiations, aid in training the Mauritian Police and Security Forces should be offered in an attempt to obtain their agreement, without formally taking on the responsibility to provide United Kingdom forces for internal security.
- (b) The compensation payments could not be met from the provision which had been made for overseas aid; and there were substantial grounds for suggesting that, since they would in effect represent the price paid for the acquisition of a defence asset, they should be charged to Defence Votes, although the Ministry of Overseas Development might well be responsible for the control of the payments if these were for aid purposes. On the other hand it would be unfortunate to impose on Defence Votes any avoidable additional burden at a time when we were seeking to secure the maximum economy in defence expenditure. The question of which Departmental Vote should bear these costs should therefore be further considered by the Treasury.

The Prime Minister, summing up the discussion, said that at the forthcoming conference we might if necessary agree to "consider sympathetically" the provision of United Kingdom forces for purposes of internal security at the request of the Mauritius Government after independence if it proved that agreement could not be reached on the basis of our providing assistance in training and by the secondment of trained personnel for the Mauritius Police and Security Forces. A decision on whether or not we should detach the islands in question by Order in Council if the agreement of Mauritius Ministers could not be obtained to this course need not be taken at this stage, and until we could see how the forthcoming conference progressed. It was, however, essential that our position on the detachment of the islands should in no way be prejudiced during its course and the Colonial Secretary should bring the matter back to the Committee in good time for a decision to be reached on this issue before the conference reached any conclusion.

The Committee-

- (1) Invited the Colonial Secretary:
 - (a) to be guided by the Prime Minister's summing up in the course of the forthcoming constitutional conference.
 - (b) to bring the matter before them again before the conference reached any conclusion.
- (2) Invited the Chief Secretary, Treasury, in consultation with the Deputy Secretary of State for Defence, the Colonial Secretary and the Minister of Overseas Development to give further consideration to the departmental responsibility for the expenditure involved.

3. Southern Rhodesia

The Commonwealth Secretary said that on his recent tour of a number of Commonwealth countries in West Africa he had been under strong pressure from political leaders there to seek an early agreement in Southern Rhodesia. They were conscious of our difficulties and while a solution on the basis of the five principles which we had laid down might not be publicly welcomed, they recognised the necessity for compromise if agreement were to be obtained. In Southern Rhodesia itself the recent conference of the Rhodesia Pront Party appeared to have led to a hardening of attitudes and it was possible that the Prime Minister, Mr. Smith, might now intend to make a unilateral declaration of independence (u.d.i). - Before seeing this minute, I had had a telephone call from Mr. Trafford Smith of the Colonial Office who wished to inform me of the discussion he had had with the Colonial Secretary and the Governor of Mauritius regarding the tractics for the constitutional conference and how to introduce the kubjection approximation in the constitutional conference and how to introduce the kubjection approximation in a smaller group with the constitutional talks, the object being to link both up fire possible package deal at the end. The smaller group would be chaired by the Colonial Secretary and would comprise the Governor and this advisers, Rangoolam, and three Mauritius party leaders, also Ministers in the Coalition, probably the leader of the Parti Mauritienne, a Muslim and a Hindu.
- 3. Mr. Trafford Smith womiered whether someone from the Foreign Office and/or someone from the Ministry of Defence might at a suitable stage in the support facilities talks attend to give some statement on the general importance of the facilities we need in the context of global defence and Anglo-American interest. I said that though I for my part would be willing to do this if it were thought desirable, my inclination was that the less we stressed the American interest the better.
- the better.

 4. Mr. Trafford Smith then went on to say that in the course of the talks the Colonial Office anticipated that the Mauritians would put forward their demands for an increased single of the manner by the British officials, but it would be difficult for the latter to talk convincingly of the American difficulties. These would have to be answered in a pretty negative manner by the British officials, but it would be difficult for the latter to talk convincingly of the American difficulties. The Colonial Office wondered whether it would not be tactically a good thing to ask American experts to talk to the Mauritian leaders exclusively on the two points of sugar quota and immigration so that the Mauritians aid not feel that they had been foobed off with second-hand views. I replied to Mr. Trafford Smith that the Americans were extremely keen to keep out of all the negotiations for support facilities which they considered to be our affair and that I would be very reluctant to bring them into the talks, if only for the very good reason that this would raise the price. However on the understanding that all they required were members of the American Embassy with expert briefs on these two specific subjects, I undertook without commitment to sound out the American Embassy accordingly. I shall tackle Mr. George Newman on the subject, this afternoon if opportunity arises. I understand that this erruption into the talks would be wanted towards the send of next washfor the beginning of the week starting on 15 September.

MAURITIUS - DEFENCE

DRAFT RECORD OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE'S TALK WITH STR S. BANGOOLAM AT 10.00 HOURS ON MONDAY. 13th SEPTEMBER. IN THE COLONIAL OFFICE

(SIR J. RENNIE AND MR. STACPOOLE ALSO PRESENT)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE explained that he had invited Sir S. Ramgolam for this talk in order to obtain hiw own reactions to the proposals which had been put to the Mauritius Government and his styles on likely reactions by his colleagues.

SIR S. RAMGOOLAM recalled that after the Governor had put the proposal to the Council of Ministers he had had a separate meeting with his colleagues. At that time he had found them almost unanisously against the proposal to excise the islands from meuritius's furlediction but ready to consider greating a lease on any conditions actisfactory to the British Government. Air, buyal alone had been ready to consider negotiations or a lease, but sir S. Ramgoolsm doubted whether his party would agree with this. The Meuritius Government had a long-standing policy against the sale of Crown lands. There was no reason for the British Government to rear for the security of facilities in the dependencies of Mauritius.

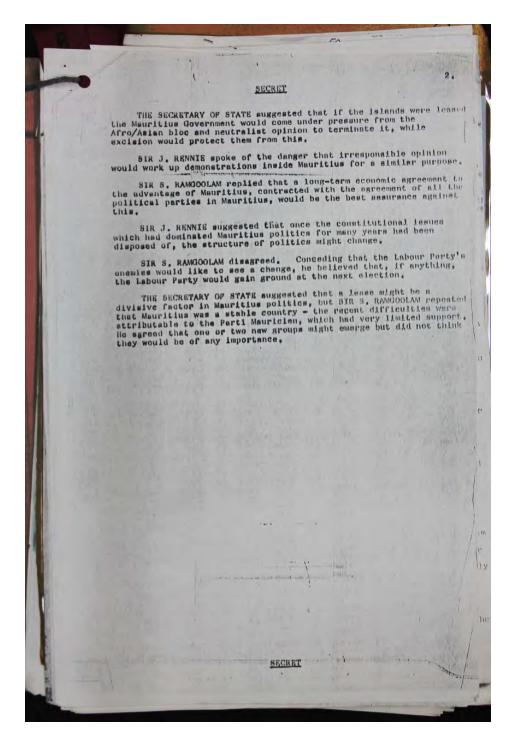

SIR J. RENNIE pointed out that much of the land in Diego Gardia was probably already held in freehold i.e. it had already been allenated.

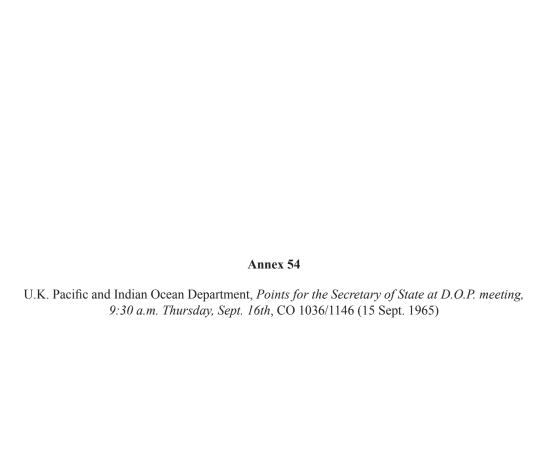

THE SECRETARY OF STATE said that it seemed unlikely that the united States Government would accept the proposal that the islands should be leased, but enquired what terms the Mauritius Government envisaged for a lease agreement.

SIR 8. RAMSOOLAM reminded the Secretary of State that the Mauritius Government has asked the United States Government to undertake to purchase a substantial portion of Mauritius's sugar output at the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement price. They also hoped that the United States would purchase tunney and undertake to supply wheat and United States would purchase tunney and undertake to supply wheat and write in fixed quantities and at fixed prices. In addition, they wanted continued meteorological and also possibly air nevigetional wanted continued meteorological and also possibly air nevigetional facilities, they would like preference in any fishing rights in Diego Carela waters and they hoped that any labour or materials required for construction of the facilities would be obtained from or through mouritius. They would also require the payment of a regular money post.

SIK J. RENNIE said that he did not recall any mention of the procurement of materials from Mauritius (Mauritius had in any case nothing he could think of to offer). He thought that Mauritius ministers had mentioned the payment of a capital sum but not an engust rent.

BIR S. RAMMOOLAM did not comment on this, but went on to assure the Secretary of State that the Mauritius Government was ready to accept its full peaponsibilities in the sphere of defence, adding that he had no sympathy with talk of non-alignment, which was not in its view reconcilable with a 'vigilant democracy'.

Points for the Secretary of State at D.O.P. meeting

The Mauritius Conference - progress so far

In plenary sessions, the four main Mauritius parties and the two leading Independents (Mr. Paturau and Mr. Ah Chuen, on behalf of the Chinese) have set out their opening positions. All the parties except Parti Mauricien have circulated papers to the Conference summarising their views, and the Parti Ma uricien will shortly table their paper.

2. On the basis of these papers (we have had the Parti Mauricien paper, privately, in draft for some days) separate negotiations have been held individually with each party and with the two Independents. Parallel with these meetings, a Committee of the whole Conference under the chairmanship of Lord Taylor has been studying the franchise and the electoral system, one of the most difficult technical problems to be settled in a multi-racial community like Mauritius. Tomorrow, the intention is to start in plenary session the process of going through the detailed provisions of the constitution in broad outline to determine the extent to which general agreement can be reached on isolated points of difference. 3. The main issue to be decided at the Conference is the future status of Mauritius -/independence with safeguards for minorities, or some form of association. It is already becoming clear at the separate discussions with individual parties that, while the leaders have shown a certain degree of flexibility and to some extent moved a little closer towards one another's positions, the likelihood of getting support from a substantial majority of the Conference for an agreed outcome is small. Though the Mauritius Labour Party led by Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, the largest single party, is pressing for independence and maintains that it has the support of the majority of the inhabitants of Mauritius, solid evidence for this support has so far not been produced, and the Parti Mauricien have put forward a strong case for believing that there might the a small majority seemet independence if the point were put impartially to the test. For this reason, the Parti Mauricien insists that a referendum must be an essential prerequisite for acceptance of any final solution, while the Labour Party is against a referencum and prefers an election as a means of consulting the people. The Muslim Party is pressing for sparate communal representation, and it looks as though the Mauritius Labour Party have promised them that as the price of their support for independence. It is possible however that the Muslim Party might throw their lot in with the Parti Mauricien in certain circumstances. Decause of the general objections to communalism, and the undue importance which any acceptance of it gives to the Muslim Party in Mauritius, an early move at the Conference may be to rule out communal electorates as being unacceptable to H.M.G. and to propose that the problem of adequate representation of minorities should be solved by other electoral means.

4. In this situation, and on the form at present shown by the various groups at the Conference, it seems that the strength of feeling against independence may make it impossible for the Conference to accept a programme by which Mauritius would proceed straightforwardly to independence. It may be necessary to decide on a form of association under which at any time in the future, if a sufficient majority of the people desired it, the territory could go on to independence: /or if support for such a solution is inadequate, to finish the Conference with two alternative constitutional schemes, one for an independent Mauritius, the other for a form of association with Britain, the choice being put to the people by referendum. A referendum may in any case be necessary as the balance of opinion at the Conference may be so close as to make it impossible for H.M.G. to impose a solution in favour of either independence or association. It may yet turn out that a decision for independence could be made acceptable to an adequate majority in Mauritius with adequate minority safeguards which might involve some commitment by Britain to assist in the maintenance of internal security in some circumstances, as well as to look after external defence. So far, neither the possibility of a defence treaty covering external defence, nor of internal security, have been discussed but the intention is to open up this question, which is one of the key elements in reaching a settlement, in discussions with individual groups. (R. Lee P.S. at Sal of wath) All Market Market Parametric Defence facilities in the Indian Ocean - discussions with Mauritius Ministers

5. This subject is, of course, not on the agenda of the Mauritius Conference: but the possible requirement as part of the Mauritius constitutional settlement for a treaty covering external defence and some arrangement for British assistance in the maintenance of internal security establishes a link between the two sets of negotiations and it may be that in the end, it will be necessary to reach a settlement on both questions at the same time. On September 13th the Secretary of State met the principal Mauritius Ministers concerned (the four Party Leaders and Mr. Paturau, an Independent) for a first run over the ground. The general proposal for the detachment of the islands had already been put to the Mauritius Council of Ministers by the Governor before the delegations had left Mauritius, and Mauritius Ministers had shown themselves favourably disposed in principle, but had made various suggestions for special compensation from the Americans. They wanted a U.S. sugar quota of 300,000 tons, special facilities for immigrants from Mauritius, provisions for the use of Mauritius labour and meterials in any construction work on the islands in question, the safeguarding of fishing and mineral rights etc.; above all, they proposed a lease

SECRET

At the meeting on Monday, the Mauritius Ministers were informed of our reaction and that of the Americans to this proposal. Because of the basic Anglo-American agreement under which the British provided the sites while the Americans did the construction, tripartite negotiations were out of the question. The fact that American sugar quotas were a matter for Congress made it difficult to negotiate a special arrangement for Mauritius, and our expert advice is that it would be against both Mauritius and Commorwealth interests to attempt to do so. There were similar objections as regards special arrangements for Mauritius immigration into the U.S. The Mauritius Ministers showed some reluctance to accept these points, and arrangements were made for them to see the Economic Minister at the American Embassy on September 15th. Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam told the Americans that the Mauritius Government was on the side of the free world but had to do everything possible to prevent a fall in the standard of living with the rising population - hence his concern for a maximum return from Mauritius exports and the maximum emigration. The Americans explained their difficulties as maximum emigration. The Americans explained their difficulties as regards sugar and immigration, but the Economic Minister said that he had taken note of the case made by the Mauritius Ministers and would report back to Washington.

8. The conclusion of the Monday meeting at the Colonial Office with Mauritias Ministers was that they would give further consideration to other forms of compensation than sugar and immigration. It was suggested that Britain might be able to help with economic development, and there a scheme of assisted land settlement might be worked out which would be financed from Britain, possibly through the Commonwealth Development Corporation. An approach is being made to Lord Howick and further meetings will shortly be held with Mauritius Ministers.

9. In view of the preoccupation of some sections of the Mauritius Conference delegation with provision for external defence and internal security, it may be necessary to keep the discussions on

Indian Ocean Islands

The Colonial Secretary is due to report to his colleagues at the O.P.D. tomorrow on the progress made at the Mauritius Constitutional Talks regarding obtaining the acquiescence of Mauritian leaders in the detachment of Diego Garcia (and certain other islands) for defence purposes. I learn from the Colonial Office that the defence facilities question is being treated in a small group consisting of the Colonial Secretary, the Governor and four of the principal Mauritian; political leaders. Though the question has been mentioned in general terms, I understand that it has not been grasped and various side issues such as an increased U.S. sugar and immigration quotas are being explored. It seems likely that the detachment of the islands may have to be arranged in a package deal at the conclusion of the Constitutional Talks. 2. The Foreign and Defence Secretaries may like to stress to Mr. Greenwood at the O.P.D. tomorrow the great importance they attach to obtaining, in the first place, Diego Garcia and later, certain other islands for joint defence facilities developed in conjunction with the Americans and that this strategic concept has assumed even greater importance since the Quadripartite talks on Far East defence. The Americans would take it very much amiss if we were, through lack of determination, to fail to secure these islands at this moment. If Mauritian acquiescence cannot be obtained, then the course recommended by the joint Foreigh Office/Ministry of Defence paper, i.e. forcible detachment and compensation paid into a fund, seems essential. 2. Defence Facilities in the Indian Ocean

(Previous Reference: OPD (65) 37th Meeting, Item 2, Conclusion (i))

The Colonial Secretary said that he had discussed with the Mauritian leaders the detachment of the islands in the Chagos Archipelago. They were disappointed that the United States Government was not prepared to consider the lease of the islands or to meet their requests over sugar purchases and emigration. They had however had discussions with the United States Embassy and the latter had agreed to consider their suggestions as regards trade. They had also discussed with the Colonial Development Corporation the possibility of a land settlement scheme. It had been previously envisaged that we might offer a maximum of £3 million as compensation for the detachment of the islands. He had made an initial offer of £1 million and this had not been badly received. If it would help to secure agreement we might consider making available a further £1 million to finance development schemes over a period of years. We might also consider a provision that after, say, 99 years, the islands would revert to Mauritius if they were no longer required by the United Kingdom and the United States. There had been some discussion about a continuing British responsibility for internal security, but this had been in the context of future constitutional development rather than of the detachment of the islands. Of the two main Mauritius parties one favoured independence while the other preferred a form of association with the United Kingdom. Both would want some assurance of continued British assistance in maintaining internal security but it might not be necessary for us to go beyond an agreement to consult at the request of the Mauritius Government. We were already helping to build up Mauritius security forces and would try to meet any further requests for such assistance. There had been no detailed discussion as yet about a defence agreement. The Constitutional Conference should end by the middle of the following week and he was hopeful that by then agreement on the detachment of the islands would have been secured. He had not pressed for an immediate decision both because this might prejudice agreement on the constitutional issues and because the Mauritian leaders were aware of the strength of their bargaining position and undue pressure might only induce them to put up their

In discussion it was pointed out that an urgent and satisfactory desired from the detachment of the islands was necessary both in our own defence interests and in order to maintain our political and military relations with the United States.

Summing up the discussion the Prime Minister said that the Committee would wish to take note of the Colonial Secretary's statement and to express the hope that agreement for the detachment of the islands would be reached urgently, and in any case by the end of the present Constitutional Conference. A decision on whether or not we should detach the islands in question by Order in Council

Mr. A. J. Fairclough Mr. S. Bissoondoyal
Mr. J. Stacpoole Mr. J. M. Paturau

The Secretary of State again expressed his desire to keep the discussion of the proposal to establish defence facilities in the Mauritius dependencies separate from the Constitutional Conference and mentioned his own double role as a spokesman of Her Majesty's Government's interests in this matter and as a custodian within the British Government of the interests of Mauritius. He enquired about the upshot of the meeting between Mauritian Ministers and officials of the U.S. Embassy in London.

Mr. Koenig replied that the U.S. spokesman had been unable to offer concessions. They had promised to transmit to their Government the points made by the Mauritius Delegation but had been unable to give any indication when the U.S. Government's reaction would be made known.

The Secretary of State suggested that the Mauritius Government should draw the conclusion from the United States Government's attitude - for instance their insistence on excision and their refusal to consider a lease - that the Americans did not regard the proposed facilities as indispensable. (In subsequent discussion the possibility that the facilities required might conceivably be established in islands belonging to Seychelles was mentioned by the Secretary of State). He went on to outline, for the confidential information of the Mauritius Ministers, the economic assistance which the Mauritius Government could expect from Britain up to 1968 irrespective of compensation for the defence facilities; this would include a C.D. & W. allocation for 1966/8 totalling £2.4m., i.e. £800,000 per year, while Britain would envisage that, subject to the relevant criteria being met and if a genuine need could be shown, it would be possible to consider making available Exchequer loans to Mauritius at the rate of about £1m. a year. This possible loan figure was in no sense an allocation - allocations of Exchequer loans were never made and it was not intended that this should be done in this case.

Sir S. Ramgoolam commented that this would fall far short of Mauritius' needs for development finance.

The Secretary of State said that in present economic conditions, Britain was unfortunately unable to increase her total aid to the developing countries. He suggested that against this background a sum of the order (say £1m.) previously mentioned as compensation for the detachment of Diego Garcia would be very valuable if it were used to finance, for instance, a land settlement scheme. Whatever sum was settled on, it should be allocated for specific and identifiable projects and would, of course, be entirely separate from the compensation to be paid to land owners in Diego Garcia and from expenditure on resettlement.

Sir S. Ramgoolam said that the Mauritius Government was not interested in the excision of the islands and would stand out for a 99-year lease. They envisaged a rent of about £7m. a year for the first twenty years and say £2m. for the remainder. They regarded the offer of a lump sum of £1m. as derisory and would rather make the transfer gratis than accept it. The alternative was for Britain to concede independence to Mauritius and allow the Mauritius Government to negotiate thereafter with the British and United States Governments over Diego Garcia.

Mr. Koenig spoke of Mauritius' record of loyalty to Britain in two World Wars and his own natural inclination to advocate that the facilities required for Commonwealth defence should be made available free of charge. As against this the grave economic needs of Mauritius made him anxious to find some middle way between a generous gesture of this kind and what Sir S. Ramgoolam had proposed. He urged that the possibility of inducing the U.S. Government, who had rejected all the suggestions which the Mauritius Government had put forward, to find some alternative method of providing economic assistance for Mauritius should be explored. The U.S. Embassy officials had left him unconvinced that the U.S. Government understood or felt any interest in the economic needs of Mauritius.

Mr. Mohamed suggested that the Mauritius Government should now await replies from the U.S. Government on the points which had been discussed at the recent meeting. But Sir S. Ramgoolam thought it would be better to bring further pressure to bear upon the U.S. Government through the British Government to increase the quota for Mauritius sugar in the U.S. domestic market.

The Secretary of State pointed out that Diego Garcia was not in present conditions a source of wealth to Mauritius; and that it would be in the general interests of the area, including the interests of Mauritius, that there should be an Anglo/U.S. military presence there.

Sir S. Ramgoolam rejoined that he fully understood the desirability of this, not only in the interests of Mauritius but in those of the whole Commonwealth. He repeated that he would prefer to make the facilities available free of charge rather than accept a lump sum of £1m. which was insignificant seen against Mauritius' annual recurrent budget amounting to about £13.5m. - with the development budget the total was about £20m. He was not trying, he said, to extract the large sums he had mentioned from the British Government, for that would damage the prosperity of the parent country of the Commonwealth to which all the developing countries in the Commonwealth looked for aid. It was from the United States that additional aid should come.

The Secretary of State pointed out that the U.S.

Government undertook world wide defence responsibilities in alliance with Britain. The distinction Sir Seewoosagur was observing was therefore an over-simplification. He invited comments from the other Mauritian Ministers.

Mr. Bissoondoyal and Mr. Mohamed expressed their support for the views expounded by the Premier.

After Sir S. Ramgoolam had suggested that if Mauritius could sell 300,000 tons of sugar yearly in the U.S. domestic market she would gain some £15m., Mr. Trafford Smith pointed out that, as explained earlier, under the proposed arrangement it fell to Britain to undertake all expenditure connected with the acquisition of the site for the proposed facilities, including compensation to the Mauritius Government.

Mr. Koenig said that, recognising that this was so, the Mauritius ministers had tried at their meeting at the United States Embassy to argue for assistance over and above financial compensation; they wanted arrangements which would provide assistance with trade. Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam stressed that Mauritius ministers needed to provide for the future; lump sum compensation now was no good; something of long term assistance to the people of Mauritius was necessary and this was why trade arrangements were sought.

Sir John Rennie made the point that, if Mauritius obtained lump sum compensation now, they could put it into valuable development which could provide a continuing benefit to Mauritius and a continuing income to the Mauritius Government. It was moreover the case that the Mauritius Government would be acquiring land which it did not at present own in compensation for land surrendered in Chagos. Sir Hilton Poynton agreed and made the point that if, for example, lump sum compensation were invested in a land settlement scheme, then the position would be that at no capital cost to the Mauritius Government they would have secured an appreciable recurrent benefit by way of rents paid by the settlers.

Mr. Mohamed interjected that there had been some experience of the difficulty in collecting rents; a lend settlement scheme would not produce much income.

Sir Seewoosagur Rangoolam repeated that the matter should be considered on the basis of Chagos being made available on a 99 year lease. The Secretary of State said that he could of course see the advantages of this from Mauritius's point of view. He wished that he thought that such an arrangement might be acceptable. The United States Government had been so specific and categorical in insisting that British sovereignty must be retained over Chagos — in other words that Chagos should be made available on the basis of detachment — that he felt sure that a lease would not be acceptable. In these circumstances, as he had said earlier, it was his own personal view that the whole project might well fall through and the United States Government look elsewhere for the facilities they sought if Mauritius continued to demand a lease.

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam said that the sort of compensation that had been suggested was of no real interest to the Mauritius Government. The United States was spending vast sums of money elsewhere in the world on bases that were not secure. Admittedly Diego Garcia was not being used at present; but in the future it might be of great strategic significance. Mauritius must obtain some significant benefit from making it available. He did not pretend to know the military significance of Diego Garcia but, in considering compensation for Mauritius, the scale on which the United States has accepted expenditure on bases elsewhere had to be borne in mind. The Secretary of State pointed out that it was most unlikely that Diego Garcia would ever be built up on such a scale as the kind of bases that Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam was referring to. Sir Hilton Poynton made the point that Sir Seewoosagur appeared to be referring to the cost of building military installations and not of acquisition of sites. Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam repeated that attention should be paid to what the United States had spent elsewhere in considering compensation for Mauritius. There were other considerations also to be borne in mind. Mauritius had an increasing population to cope with and the Government must ensure that standards do not decline - or only do so very slightly. A lump sum of £1 million was not of interest.

Mr. Paturau made the point that if, as had been suggested, the suggestion of using Diego Garcia were dropped and the required facilities were developed in islands belonging to Scychelles, this would cost a great deal more. These islands were much further from, for example, India and Ceylon and so would presumably be less directly valuable. It therefore seemed to him that it must be worth an appreciable amount to the United States that Diego Garcia should be made available. Mauritius should have obtained a one hundred thousand ton U.S. sugar quota in 1962. It was lost as a result of political pressure. If, given the apparent value of Diego Garcia to the United States Mauritius could now use political pressure to secure a substantial sugar quota, this seemed to him only sensible.

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam then suggested that the Mauritius ministers' proposals should be communicated to the United States Government. When Mr. Trafford Smith made the point that the United States Government was not directly involved since negotiations on this matter were between the Mauritius and British Governments, Sir Seewoosagur suggested that it might then be better if the whole matter were left until Mauritius were independent and were then negotiated with the independent Government.

The Secretary of State then said that it might be possible for him to secure agreement to increasing the proposed compensation from £1 million in the direction of £2 million. In reply to this Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam said that the Mauritius ministers had not come to bargain. They could not bargain over their relationship with the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth. But there were real economic difficulties in Mauritius and if the British Government could obtain assistance on the lines they had suggested this would be highly desirable. He reiterated that lump sum compensation was not of such importance as something which would ensure a steady economy for Mauritius over a period of years. As regards the suggestion that lump sum compensation could be invested in e.g. land settlement he said that he did not wish to be tied to particular projects at once; he did not wish to commit future governments of Mauritius. Land settlement had been tried some years ago and lossons had been larned and changes made. On this point Sir John Rennie interjected that, whilst he did not himself think that £1 million was very much by way of compensation, it was nonetheless clear that land settlement must be undertaken now; and capital provided by way of lump sum compensation would make this possible.

The Secretary of State said that what Mauritius ministers were really saying was that because the United States could not help over her sugar quota and trade, then the United Kingdom must stump up hard cash instead. Mr. Mohamed said that this was not really the way they looked at it.

If only the U.K. were involved then they would be willing to hand over Diego Garcia to the U.K. without any compensation; Mauritius was already under many obligations to the U.K. But when the United States was involved as well then they wanted something substantial by way of continuing benefit. They were prepared to forego lump sum compensation but continuity was essential and the most important thing was the U.S. sugar quota. The Secretary of State said that he would like to be clear on the attitude of Mauritius ministers. As he understood it their attitude could be summed up as follows:

- (i) If economic assistance from the United States on the scale that had been suggested could be made available then the Mauritius Government would be willing to agree to the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago without compensation.
- (ii) If however economic assistance on the lines suggested was not forthcoming then they would propose that Chagos should be made available on a 99 year lease at a rental of £7 million por annum for 20 years and £2 million thereafter.

(iii) That the Mauritius Government were not in any event interested in lump sum compensation from Britain of £2 million, part in capital at once and part spread over a period.

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, commenting on the third of the above points said that they could not contemplate demanding assistance that they would regard as adequate from their "parent and relation"; this would only take away part of a limited pool of assistance which was of help to the whole Commonwealth. But a foreign government was involved and they should pay up. The Secretary of State made the point that U.S. and U.K. defence facilities throughout the world were so inextricably interwoven together that it simply would not be possible for us to domand from the United States that they should make substantial annual payments to Mauritius. Mr. Koenig took this point and said that he thought that the United States could not be expected to make money payments to Mauritius; what they wanted was trade. Although at the meeting they had had at the U.S. Embassy the point had been made that the administration was not responsible for the sugar quota, he, Mr. Koenig, had made the point that, given the present position in Aden and Singapore and given also the attitude of China, it seemed to him very possible that these considerations would so impress even Congress that they might be willing to adopt a different attitude regarding the sugar quota for Mauritius than the one they had adopted on the previous occasion in 1962; it was noteworthy that their attitude then, too, had been dicated by political considerations.

The Socretary of State said that it would obviously be highly undesirable to have a public discussion in Congress involving the situation in Aden and Singapore. Even though, as Mr. Koenig pointed cut there had been public discussion of defence facilities in the Indian Ocean, it would be impossible for those to be linked with the question of the sugar quota. The Sccretary of State added that if it would be of assistance he would have thought that it would have been possible to agree that any agreement concerning Chagos might provide that it would be returned to Mauritius if British and American defence interests in it ceased; he would have to consult his colleagues on this point but it seemed to him feasible.

Mr. Paturau said that he could see that the Mauritius Government's original proposal of a U.S. sugar quota of three to four hundred thousand tens would be extremely difficult since it would inevitably have to be linked with the question of defence facilities. But surely discussion of a one hundred thousand ton quota was possible without this difficulty; one hundred thousand tens was the figure that had been proposed by the U.S. administration in 1962 but completely rejected by Congress; there seemed no reason why discussion of a quota of this amount now need be linked with the defence issue. Mr. Trafford Smith again stressed the intense difficulties that would arise over any question of a special sugar quota for Mauritius because of the fact that all other Commonwealth suppliers were involved.

Sir Scewoosagur Ramgoolam then said that an alternative arrangement might be to calculate what benefit Mauritius would have derived from the sort of sugar quota and other trade arrangements that they had been suggesting and for the United States Government to make yearly payments to Mauritius of that amount. One could calculate the figure on the basis of say, 20 per cent gross profit on say, £13 to £15 million worth of sugar plus the benefits of the proposed rice and wheat agreements. He was talking in this connection in terms of a lease but if the islands were detached then different figures could easily be calculated; it should in any case be provided that if the islands ceased to be needed for defence purposes they would revert to Mauritius.

Sir H. Poynton mentioned the precedent of certain U.S. bases in the West Indies, leased in 1940 and no longer needed, which had reverted to the jurisdiction of the Government concerned.

Mr. Paturau said that for the past two years Antigua and Fiji had been taking up Mauritius' quota in the U.S. market and they would have no grounds for complaint if Mauritius' quota was now enlarged at their expense; but in fact the 100,000 tons a year, for which Mauritius was asking, could be absorbed in the increase of consumption in the United States.

Sir H. Poynton said that the British Embassy in Washington had advised strongly against any departure from the "past performance" formula. The United States might offer some readjustment within the Commonwealth quota but even this would risk breaching the "past performance" formula to the disadvantage of the Commonwealth as a whole. Moreover even if this difficulty could be avoided it would clearly be extremely difficult to secure agreement within the Commonwealth.

Mr. Paturau said that Mauritius had been unfairly dealt with when quotas were established on the basis of performance in the first half of a year since Mauritius, along with all Southern Hemisphere producers, was a "second-half-year" producer.

Summing up the discussion, the Secretary of State said that the Mauritius Government sought economic help from the United States, or failing this a monetary payment from the United States. He felt bound to warn Mauritian Ministers that there was no prospect of their getting anything approaching what they were asking for, and that there was a risk that the United States Government would look elsewhere for the facilities they needed. It would be cheaper to build an island than pay the sums suggested. He suggested an adjournment and expressed the hope that the Mauritius Government would look urgently for more acceptable proposals which could be discussed at an early further meeting.

Some discussion followed on the method by which Sir S. Ramgoolam's figure of £7m. a year for additional economic aid had been arrived at. Sir S. Ramgoolam said that he had calculated the benefits Mauritius would receive from the proposals about trade in sugar, wheat and rice between Mauritius and the U.S.A. at about £3-4m. a year; and had put forward £5-7m. to take account of rising population and unforeseen needs. It appeared, however, that if the United States took 300,000 tons of Mauritius sugar at the domestic price £45 per ton) the difference between this and the world price for the same quantity (at £20 per ton) would be £7.5m. per annum.

NOTE FOR THE RECORD

Mauritius

The Prime Minister held a meeting at No. 10 Downing Street at 5.30 p.m. on September 20. The Colonial Secretary, the Defence Secretary and officials were present.

The Colonial Secretary reported on the latest stage of the Constitutional Conference on Mauritius. He said that the Mauritians had opened their mouths very wide over compensation for the detachment of Diego Garcia. It was agreed that the Prime Minister would have a private word with Sir R. Ramgoolam on the following day.

I subsequently telephoned Mr. Stacpoole (Colonial Office) to say that the Prime Minister could see Sir R. Ramgoolam at 5.00 p.m. on September 21 and to ask for speaking notes.

There was also a very brief discussion on Aden Comer telegrams Nos. 998 and 1018. It was agreed that it Adex Oxio would be best to try to hold the position until after Mr. George Thomson had seen President Nasser and King Feisal.

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam is coming to see you at 10.00 tomorrow morning. The object is to frighten him with hope: hope that he might get independence; Fright lest he might not unless he is sensible about the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago. I attach a brief prepared by the Colonial Office, with which the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign Office are on the whole content. The key sentence in the brief is the last sentence of it on page three.

I also attach a minute from the Colonial Secretary, which he has not circulated to his colleagues, but a copy of which I have sent to Sir Burke Trend. In it, the Colonial Secretary rehearses arguments with which you are familiar but which have not been generally accepted by Ministers.

PRIME MINISTER

I am glad you are seeing Ramgoolam because the Conference is a difficult one and I am anxious that the bases issue should not make it even harder to get a Constitutional settlement than it is already. I hope that we shall be as generous as possible and I am sure that we should not seem to be trading Independence for detachment of the Islands. That would put us in a bad light at home and abroad and would sour our relations with the new state. And it would not accord well with the line you and I have taken about the Aden base (which has been well received even in the Committee of 24). Agreement is therefore desirable and agreement would be easier if Ramgoolam could be assured that:

- (a) We would retrocede the Islands if the need for them vanished, and
- (b) We were prepared to give not merely financial compensation (I would think £5,000,000 would be reasonable but so far the D.O.P. have only approved £3,000,000) but a defence agreement and an undertaking to consult together if a serious internal security situation arose in Mauritius.

The ideal would be for us to be able to announce that the Mauritius Government had agreed that the Islands should be made available to the U.K. government to enable them to fulfil their defence commitments in the area.

NOTE FOR THE PRIME MINISTER'S MEETING WITH SIR SEEWOOSAGUR RAMGOOLAM, PREMIER OF MAURITIUS

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam (call him 'Sir Seewoosagur' - pronounced as spelt with accents on the first andthird syllables: or 'Fremier' his official title. He likes being called 'Frime Minister').

Born Mauritius 1900. Hindu. Locally educated, studied medicine at University College Hospital, London. L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S. Leader of the Mauritius Labour Party, the largest Mauritius political party, which polled 42% of the electorate at the 1963 General Election. In politics since 1940. Knight Bachelor, June 1965, dubbed last Saturday, September 18th, his 65th birthday.

Getting old. Realises he must get independence soon or it will be too late for his personal career. Rather status-conscious. Responds to flattery.

The Defence Facilities Proposals

The proposal is that the whole of the Chagos Archipelago (population about 1000), shall be detached from Mauritius: and three islands from Seychelles. In developing defence facilities, the British would be responsible for providing the sites, including compensation, removal and resettlement of population, etc., and the Americans for construction, with joint British-American user of the facilities. Neither the American nor the British defence authorities can accept leasehold. At present no more than an airfield and communications installations will be constructed.

On the British side, the total cost might be up to £10m., of which Mauritius and Seychelles would each receive about £3m. compensation for detachment, while costs of compensation to landowners, resettlement of displaced population and other contingencies might about to £3-4m. The U.S. Government has secretly agreed to contribute half these costs indirectly, by writing off equivalent British payments towards Polaris development costs.

not for mention

The Mauritius reaction

The proposals have been discussed, first in Mauritius by the Governor with the Council of Ministers, and more recently in London by the Secretary of State with the four main Mauritius party leaders and a leading Independent Minister. Their reaction has been that, while in principle they are anxious to co-operate in western defence, they cannot contemplate detachment but propose a long lease, and that they would require concessions from the Americans as regards U.S. purchases of Mauritius sugar and Mauritius purchases of U.S. rice and wheat on favourable terms, and also as regards emigration to the U.S. The unsurmountable difficulties of securing these concessions from the Americans, especially as regards sugar (which the Mauritians regard as the most important) have been explained to Mauritius Ministers at length, and they have heard the arguments direct from the Economic Minister at the U.S. Embassy. When offered lump-sum compensation for detachment of the order of £2m., they brushed it aside as a drop in the ocean of Mauritius requirements, returned to their proposals for trade and immigration concessions from the U.S., and suggested as an alternative that they should receive what the Mauritians calculate is the money value of these concessions, viz. up to £7m. per annum for twenty years and £2m. per annum thereafter. (They appear to think that we ought to persuade the Americans to pay this. The Premier at one stage said he was not trying to "sting" Britain for this).

There is thus deadlock as to compensation for detachment. In discussion however, Mauritius Ministers have made it clear that, since the Americans are involved, their desire is for trade concessions from the Americans, and that, if it were simply a matter of helping Britain, they might consider providing the sites as a gesture of co-operation - though whether with or without the £2m. compensation is not clear. The discussions have also shown that agreement that the islands should revert to Mauritius when no longer required for defence facilities might help.

In the course of discussion, the Secretary of State hinted that, if Mauritius Ministers persisted in their demands, it might be necessary for H.M.G. either to call the whole thing off or to consider whether the facilities could be provided entirely on Seychelles islands. On their side, Mauritius Ministers are well aware that H.M.G. wishes to continue to enjoy the use of H.M.S. Mauritius, a £5m. communications station, and Plaisance airfield, both in the island of Mauritius itself and both of strategic importance.

The Mauritius Constitutional Conference

58 I

The gap between the parties led by Sir S. Ramgoolam wanting independence, and the Parti Mauricien and its supporters who seek continuing association ith Britain, will not be closed by negotiation. H.M.G. will have to impose a solution. The remaining conference sessions will be devoted to bringing the position of all parties on details of the constitution as close together as possible and, in particular to securing the agreement of all parties to the maximum possible safeguards for minorities. The Secretary of State's mind is moving towards a decision in favour of independence, followed by a General Election under the new Constitution before Independence Day, as the right political ratherithm a referendum to choose between independence and free association, as the Parti Maurician have demanded.

/followed

Sir S. Ramgoolam's present position

The Premier heads an Ill-Party Covernment: - hence the negotiations on defence facilities with the leaders of all parties. It is thus difficult for him to come to any final agreement on the defence facilities without consulting his colleagues. The Premier should not leave the interview with certainty as to H.M.G's decision as regards independence, as during the remaining sessions of the Conference it may be necessary to press him to the limit to accept maximum safeguards for minorities.

Handling the interview

The Prime Minister might say that he has heard of the progress of the Conference and knows that the Secretary of State is impressed by the difficulties of the proposals for a referendum and free association, and the strength of the case for independence. If the ultimate decision is in favour of independence, the Premier will understand the necessity to include in the Independence Constitution maximum safeguards for minorities, especially as regards the electoral system, so as to remove as far as possible their legitimate fears. With the Conference approaching its end it would be regrettable if difficulties should arise over the defence facilities question. The Premier has asked for independence but at the same time has said that he would like to have a defence treaty, and possibly to be able to call on us for assistance in certain circumstances towards maintaining internal security. If the Premier wants us to help him in this way, he must help us over the defence facilities, because these are in the long term interests both of Britain and Mauritius. He must play his part as a Commonwealth statesman in helping to provide them.

Throughout consideration of this problem, all Departments have accepted the importance of securing consent of the Mauritius Government to detachment. The Premier knows the importance we attach to this. In the last resort, however, detachment could be carried out without Mauritius consent, and this possibility has been left open in recent discussions in Defence and Overseas Policy Committee. The Prime Minister may therefore wish to make some oblique reference to the fact that H.M.G. have the legal right to detach Chagos by Order in Council, without Mauritius consent, but this would be a grave step.

RECORD OF A CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE PRIME MINISTER AND THE PREMIER OF MAURITIUS, SIR SEEMOOSAGUR RAMGOOLAM, AT NO. 10, DOWNING STREET, AT 10 A.M. ON THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1965

Present:-

The Prime Minister The Premier of Mauritius, Mr. J.O. Wright Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam

After welcoming the Prime Minister of Mauritius, the Prime Minister said how glad he was to see him in London: the Queen had told him at his audience the previous Sunday of the honour she had bestowed on him on his 65th birthday. The Prime Minister then asked Sir Seewoosagur how the conference was going. Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam said that the conference was going reasonably well. He had had a discussion with his colleagues the previous evening and they were now thinking over what he had said. He himself felt that Independence was the right answer; the other ideas of association with Britain worked out on the lines of the French Community simply would not work. There was also some difference of opinion over the future of the electoral pattern in Rhodesia.

The Prime Minister said that he knew that the Colonial Secretary, like himself, would like to work towards Independence as soon as possible, but that we had to take into consideration all points of view. He hoped that the Colonial Secretary would shortly be able to report to him and his colleagues what his conclusion was. He himself wished to discuss with Sir Seewoosagur a matter which was not strictly speaking within the Colonial Secretary's sphere: it was the Defence problem and in particular the question of the detachment of Diego Garcia. This was of course a completely separate matter and not bound up with the question of Independence. It was however a very important matter for the British position East of Suez. Britain was at present undertaking a very comprehensive Defence Review, but we were very concerned to be able to play our proper rôle not only in Commonwealth Defence but also to bear our share of peace-keeping under the United Nations: we had already made certain pledges to the United Nations for this purpose.

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam said that he and his colleagues wished to be helpful.

The Prime Minister went on to say that he had heard that some of the Premier's colleagues, perhaps having heard that the United States was also interested in these defence arrangements, and seeing that the United States was a very rich country, were perhaps raising their bids rather high. There were two points that he would like to make on this. First, while Diego Garcia was important, it was not all that important; and faced with unreasonablenes the United States would probably not go on with it. The second point was that this was a matter between Britain and Mauritius and the Prime Minister referred to recent difficulties over taxi-drivers at London Airport.

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam said that they were very concerned on Mauritius with their population explosion and their limited land resources. They very much hoped that the United States would agree to buy sugar at a guaranteed price and perhaps let them have wheat and rice in exchange. The important thing was not so much to have a lump sum but to have a steady guaranteed income.

The Prime Minister said that Britain would of course continue with certain aid and development projects. money for the airfield at Diego Garcia would also come from Britain and would come in the form of a flat sum. Moreover that flat sum would not be very much more than the Secretary of State had already mentioned. could make no commitment at the moment, the Prime Minister thought that we might well be able to talk to the Americans about providing some of their surplus wheat for Mauritius. As for Diego Garcia, it was a purely historical accident that it was administered by Mauritius. Its links with Mauritius were very slight. In answer to a question, Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam affirmed that the inhabitants of Diego Garcia did not send elected representatives to the Mauritius Parliament. Sir Seewoosagur reaffirmed that he and his colleagues were very ready to play their

The Prime Minister went on to say that, in theory, there were a number of possibilities. The Premier and his colleagues could return to Mauritius either with Independence or without it. On the Defence point, Diego Garcia could either be detached by order in Council or with the agreement of the Premier and his colleagues. The best solution of all might be Independence and detachment by agreement, although he could not of course commit the Colonial Secretary at this point.

Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam said that he was convinced that the question of Diego Garcia was a matter of detail; there was no difficulty in principle. The Prime Minister said that whilst we could make no open-ended commitment about the defence of Mauritius, our presence at Diego Garcia would, of course, make it easier to come to Mauritius's help when necessary.

On leaving, Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam said that the one great desire in Mauritius was that she should retain her links with the United Kingdom. Mauritius did not want to become a republic but on the contrary wished to preserve all her present relationships with the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister said that he felt that the Commonwealth had a much more important rôle to play in the future than it had even in the past as a great multiracial association. The last Prime Ministers' meeting had been a very exciting one and he looked forward to seeing Sir Seewoosagur at the next one.

As Sir Seewoosagur was leaving, the Cabinet was assembling outside the Cabinet Room and the Prime Minister introduced Sir Seewoosagur to a number of members of the Cabinet.

RECORD OF A MEETING HELD IN LANCASTER HOUSE AT 2.30 P.M. ON THURSDAY 23rd SEPTEMBER

MAURITIUS DEFENCE MATTERS

Present:- The Secretary of State (in the Chair)

Lord Taylor Sir Hilton Poynton Sir John Rennie Mr. P. R. Noakes Mr. J. Stacpoole

Sir S. Ramgoolam Mr. S. Bissoondoyal Mr. J. M. Paturau Mr. A. R. Mohamed

THE SECRETARY OF STATE expressed his apologies for the unavoidable postponements and delays which some delegations at the Constitutional Conference had met with earlier in the day. He explained that he was required to inform his colleagues of the outcome of his talks with Mauritian Ministers about the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago at 4 p.m. that afternoon and was therefore anxious that a decision should be reached at the present meeting.

- 2. He expressed his anxiety that Mauritius should agree to the establishment of the proposed facilities, which besides their usefulness for the defence of the free world, would be valuable to Mauritius itself by ensuring a British presence in the area. On the other hand it appeared that the Chagos site was not indispensable and there was therefore a risk that Mauritius might lose this opportunity. In the previous discussions he had found himself caught between two fires: the demands which the Mauritius Government had made, mainly for economic concessions by the United States, and the evidence that the United States was unable to concede these demands. He had throughout done his best to ensure that whatever arrangements were agreed upon should secure the maximum benefit for Mauritius. He was prepared to recommend to his colleagues if Mauritius agreed to the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago:-
 - (i) negotiations for a defence agreement between Britain and Mauritius;
 - (ii) that if Mauritius became independent, there should be an understanding that the two governments would consult together in the event of a difficult internal security situation arising in Mauritius;
 - (iii) that the British Government should use its good offices with the United States Government in support of Mauritius request for concessions over the supply of wheat and other commodities

(iv) that compensation totalling up to £3m, should be paid to the Mauritius Government over and above direct compensation to landowners and others affected in the Chagos Islands.

This was the furthest t.e British Government could go. They were anxious to settle this matter by agreement but the other British Ministers concerned were of course aware that the islands were distant from Mauritius, that the link with Mauritius was an accidental one and that it would be possible for the British Government to detach them from Mauritius by Order in Council.

- 3. SIR S. RAMGOOLAM replied that the Mauritius Government were anxious to help and to play their part in guaranteeing the defence of the free world. He asked whether the Archipelago could not be leased. (THE SECRETARY OF STATE said that this was not acceptable). MR. BISSOONDOYAL enquired whether the Islands would revert to Mauritius if the need for defence facilities there disappeared. THE SECRETARY OF STATE said that he was prepared to recommend this to his colleagues.
- 4. MR PATURAU said that he recognised the value and importance of an Anglo-Mauritius defence agreement, and the advantage for Mauritius if the facilities were established in the Chagos Islands, but he considered the proposed concessions a poor bargain for Mauritius.
- 5. MR. BISSOONDOYAL asked whether there could be an assurance that supplies and manpower from Mauritius would be used so far as possible. THE SECRITARY OF STATE said that the United States Government would be responsible for construction work and their normal practice was to use American manpower but he felt sure the British Government would do their best to persuade the American Government to use labour and materials from Mauritius.
- SIR S. RANGOOLAM asked the reason for Mr. Koenig's absence from the meeting and MR. BISSOONDOYAL asked whether the reason was a political one, saying that if so this might affect the position.
- MR. MOHAMED made an energetic protest against repeated postponements of the Secretary of State's proposed meeting with the M.C.A., which he regarded as a slight to his party.
- 8. THE SECRETARY OF STATE repeated the apology with which he had opened the meeting, explaining that it was often necessary in such conferences to concentrate attention on a delegation which was experiencing acute difficulties, while he himself had been obliged to devote much time to a crisis in another part of the world.
- 9. MR MOHAMED then handed the Secretary of State a recent private letter from Mauritius which disclosed that extensive misrepresentations about the course of the Conference had been published in a Parti Hauricien newspaper. THE SECRETARY OF STATE commented that such misrepresentations should be disregarded, and that MR. MOHAMED had putiforward the case for his community with great skill and patience.

10. MR. MCHAMED said that his party was ready to leave the bases question to the discretion of H.M.G. and to accept anything which was for the good of Mauritius. Mauritius needed a guarantee that defence help would be available nearby in case of need.

- 11. At SIR S. RAMMOOLAM'S request the Secretary of State repeated the outline he had given at a previous meeting of the development ad which would be available to Mauritius between 1966-1968, viz. a C.D. & W. allocation totalling £2.4 million (including carryover) thus meaning that £800,000 a year would be available by way of grants in addition Mauritius would have access to Exchequer loans, which might be expected to be of the order of £1m. a year, on the conditions previously explained. He pointed out that Diego Carcia was not an economic asset to Mauritius and that the proposed compensation of £3m. would be an important contribution to Mauritius development. There was no chance of raising this figure.
- 12. SIR S. RAMGOOLAM said that there was a gap of some £4m. per year between the development expenditure which his government considered necessary in order to enable the Mauritian economy to "take off" and the resources in sight, and enquired whether it was possible to provide them with additional assistance over a 10 year period to bridge this gap.
- . THE SECRETARY OF STATE mentioned the possibility of arranging for say $2m, of the proposed compensation to be paid in 10 instalments annually of $200,000.
- 14. SIR S. RAMSOOLAM enquired about the economic settlement with Malta on independence and was informed that these arrangements had been negotiated in the context of a special situation for which there was no parallel in Mauritius.
- 15. SIR H. POYMTON pointed out that if Mauritius did not become independent within three years, the Colonial Office would normally consider making a supplementary allocation of C.D. & W. grant money to cover the remainder of the life of the current C.D. & W. Act, i.e. the period up to 1970. He added that if Mauritius became independent, they would normally receive the unspent balance of their C.D. & W. allocation in a different form and it would be open to them after the three year period to seek further assistance such as Britain was providing for a number of independent Commonwealth countries.
- 16. SIR S. RAMGOOLAM said that he was prepared to agree in principle to be helpful over the proposals which H.M.G. had put forward but he remained concerned about the availability of capital for development in Mauritius and hoped that the British Government would be able to help him in this respect.
- 17. MR. BISSONDOYAL said that while it would have been easier to reach conclusions if it had been possible to obtain unanimity among the party leaders, his party was prepared to support the stand which the Fremier was taking. They attached great importance to British assistance being available in the event of a serious emergency in Mauritius.

18. MR. PATURAU asked that his disagreement should be noted. The sum offered as compensation was too small and would provide only temporary help for Mauritius economic needs. Sums as large as £25m. had been mentioned in the British press and Mauritius needed a substantial contrilation to close the gap of £4-5m. In the development budget. He added that since the decision was not unamimous, he foresaw serious political trouble over it in Mauritius.

- 19. THE SECRETARY OF STATE referred to his earlier suggestion that payment of the monetary compensation should be spread over a period of years.
- 20. SIR S. RAMGOOLAM said that he was hoping to come to London for economic discussions in October. The Mauritius Government's proposals for development expenditure had not yet been finalised, but it was already clear that there would be a very substantial gap on the revenue side.
- 21. SIR H. POYNTON said that the total sum available for C.D. & W. assistance to the dependent territories was a fixed one and it would not be possible to increase the allocation for one territory without proportionately reducing that of another.
- 22. Summing up the discussion, the SECRETARY OF STATE asked whether he could inform his colleagues that Dr. Ramgoolam, Mr. Bissoondoyal and Mr. Mohamed were prepared to agree to the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago on the understanding that he would recommend to his colleagues the following:-
 - (i) negotiations for a defence agreement between Britain and Mauritius;
 - (ii) in the event of independence an understanding between the two governments that they would consult together in the event of a difficult internal security situation arising in Mauritius;
 - (iii) compensation totalling up to £3m. should be paid to the Mauritius Government over and above direct compensation to landowners and the cost of resettling others affected in the Chagos Islands;
 - (iv) the British Government would use their good offices with the United States Government in support of Mauritius' request for concessions over sugar imports and the supply of wheat and other commodities;
 - (v) that the British Government would do their best to persuade the American Government to use labour and materials from Mauritius for construction work in the islands;
 - (vi) the British Government would use their good offices with the U.S. Government to ensure that the following facilities in the Chagos Archipelago would remain available to the Mauritius Government as far as practicable:

- (vii) that if the need for the facilities on the islands disappeared the islands should be returned to Mauritius;
- (viii) that the benefit of any minerals or oil discovered in or near the Chagos Archipelago should revert to the Hauritius Government.
- 23. SIR S. RAMGOCLAM said that this was acceptable to him and Messrs. Bissocndoyal and Mohamed in principle but he expressed the wish to discuss it with his other ministerial colleagues.
- 24. THE SECRETARY OF STATE pointed out that he had to leave almost immediately to convey the decision to his own colleagues and LORD TAYLOR urged the Maurittan Ministers not to risk losing the substantial sum offered and the important assurance of a friendly military presence nearby.
- 25. SIR'S, RANGOOLAM said that Mr. Paturau had urged him to make a further effort to secure a larger sum by way of compensation, but the Secretary of State said there was no hope of this.
- 26. SIR J. RENNIE said that while he had hoped that Mauritius would be able to obtain trading concessions in these negotiations, this was now ruled out. It was in the interest of Mauritius to take the opportunity offered to ensure a friendly military presence in the area. What was important about the compensation was the use to which the lump sum was put.
- 27. SIR S. RAMGOOLAM mentioned particular development projects, such as a dam and a land settlement scheme, and expressed the hope that Britain would make additional help available in an independence settlement.
- independence settlement.

 28. SIR H. POYNTON said that the Mauritius Government should not lose sight of the possibility of securing aid for such purposes from the World Bank, the I. D.A. and from friendly governments. While Mauritius remained a colony such powers as Western Germany regarded Mauritius economic problems as a British responsibility but there was the hope that after independence aid would be available from these sources. When Sir S. Ramgoolam suggested that he had said that grants could be extended for up to 10 years, Sir H. Poynton pointed out that he had only indicated that when the period for which the next allocation had been made expired, it would be open to the Mauritius Government to seek further assistance, from Britain, even though Mauritius had meanwhile become independent. It would not be possible to reach any understanding understanding at present beyond saying that independence did not preclude the possibility of negotiating an extension of Commonwealth aid.

29. At this point the SECRETARY OF STATE left for 10, Dowing Street, after receiving authority from Sir S. Ramgoolam and Mr. Bissondoyal to report their acceptance in principle of the proposals outlined above subject to the subsequent negotiation of details. Mr. Mohamed gave the same assurance, saying that he spoke also for his colleague Mr. Osman. Mr. Paturau said he was unable to concur.

DESTRUCT PARTETY THE SEC MODIAN OCPAN

Record of a Section with an American Delegation headed by Mrs. 2.65. Nicholan. 21 September 1965, Br. Pack in the Chair.

The Peak began by thanking the Americans for coming. He explained that the Constitutional Conference on the future of maunitius had not yet ended - it chould finish at the end of this week - one that Emericans for status for a factor of the defence project was not ret finally clear. The present talks must therefore be without couritment and without prejudice to the considerion of a satisfactory settlement with Humitius. He would nevertheless be willing to discuss the three American dearts in detail if peachle, and at any rate in outline. It seemed generally agreed that each draft should be discussed in a communities. The Winistry of Defence would deel acquarate sub-committee. The Winistry of Defence would deel acquarately with their American opposite numbers over draft A about the American financial contribution.

Er. Eitaben said that it would be more convenient for the mane sub-conmittee to deal with draft C and draft B, teking draft C this afternoon and draft B tomorrow morning. This was agreed.

game and-consistent to deal with deaft of and draft B, taking draft C this afternoon and draft B temerrow morning. This was agreed.

Mr. Eniclosed then explained the position reached in the discussion of the conference. The Betitah side had tried to keep the independence issue chich the conference was really meant to deal with, separate from the deface project, but the outcome of the latter was found to depend partly on the former problem. One main party in Haurting with a different policy from that of Fr. Rusgoolem but belonging to his confirmation of the conference was enving towards operating in the first time. There were property wanted full independence it seems that of the conference was saving towards agreement on "free association". There were properts of reaching agreement on the constitutional conference was saving towards agreement on "free association". There were properts of internal affairs. There was no sign of instead agreements for internal affairs. There was no sign of instead agreements for internal affairs. There was no sign of instead agreements for internal affairs. hely the leng term sconomic stability of Mauritius. This meant sugar, we had told the Mauritians that a eiger quote of this order or magnitude was probably impossible.

The Kitchen confirmed that a sizeable super quota was impossible and asked about Mauritian demands for a long lease rather than detachment of the islands concerned. En. Rejectours replied that there were eight that Meuritius might accept a detachment in exchange for a super quota and a reversion clause silesing the return of the islands to Hauritius if and when they were no longer required for U.S./U.K. defence purposes.

In shower to a question from Mr. Peet, Mr. Paircloush confirmed that we had told the Mouritians that a lease was out of the question. Fr. Kitchen said that they had sade it clear at the talks last dames y that an agreement of the kind made over accession laised was required. Nothing since then had caused then to change their minds. Fr. Peek saids for the American side's views on the question of a reversion clause. The Kitchen and he would prefer to deal with this in the sub-constitute. He went on to thank Mr. Pairclough for his expection.

He described the Escritian demand for a sugar quota as "out of the ball park". There had been fleres agitation recently in the Usla press against any kind of sugar quotas for securities outside the Western hemisphers. The Inthe Department considered that they had done yousen work in getting a quota of 15,000 tens for Bauritius. The situation in 1950 had been entirely different. The Cuben crisis had played haves with the sugar market. He Pairstones sourced in Eithers that the Colonial Office sugar superts fully agreed that a Reservician quota or the size suggested would cause a radical upset in cristing arrangements.

There was a brief discussion about the Mauritian request for on increased imaignation quate into the United States. It was agreed that the number of Mauritians who had applied for imaignation views in the leaf for pers was or fer below their present not very large quots that this was not worth pursuing.

Br. Eitehen emphasiced that they could not contemplate anything but once and for all compensation. They and changed the banks of the understanding reached in 1984, when it had been agreed that Halide were to be responsible for the casts of detechants and had offered to contribute a substantial sum. No more funds were available, it would take too long to reise the necessary appropriations even it they had been willing to do so. Er. Peak appropriations even it they had been willing to do so. Er. Peak appropriations even it they had been willing to do so. Er. Peak appropriations and Er. In. Fairelouse than explained the position reached over the Sevenelless. Sething more had been done after the original. Supposed to the Executive Council, since acthing could be settled until the Mauritius question was resolved. The Executive Council, specific had been reasonably satisfactory. As expected, they had seld for an sirfield. The Sevenellous had, however, made it clear in this connexion that they were not prepared to look at any formal agreement to cover the existing tracking station on any formal agreement to cover the existing tracking station on finalisation of the tracking station agreement must therefore wait on finalisation of the tracking station agreement must therefore wait on finalisation of the main project. It appeared that the latter would be velocate to the Enginellois and that the compensation the sabled for was of manageable proportions. Mrs. Kitchen suggested that the reverse process might have herrit. Supposing we reached a mettlement with the Seychelles over the laisans only required for defence purposes the Mauritians might be more inclined to see reason.

Hr. Pack pointed out the difficulty over this otherwise attrictive source of action was that the only firm military requirement now was for facilities on Diego García in the (Securities) Chapte grachipelego. Hr. Kitchen said that after all our planning also encompassed the possibility of the trailability of facilities some time on Aldabra and other of the Seychelles Inlands.

Hr. Peck made the point that we would want to swoid a second row in the United Estions if possible, and therefore to carry out the detachment as a single operation. Hr. Kitchen suggested that this was worth further discussion later. Assistedly both sides had so far thought in terms of a single operation but the price sceened to go up as time went by and a thoroughly lop-sided situation had arisen. Hr. Peck speed that detechment would have been far easier a year ago. Hr. Fairlough noted that Menritten demands seemed to be diminishing rather than increasing at this noment.

On draft C, covering the tracking station, Wr. Mitchen emphasised that they regarded this as closely related to draft A covering the American finencial contribution. They regarded the latter as dependent on a successful conduction of the tracking station agreement. Speaking frankly he very much hoped that it would be possible during our current discussions to reach agreement between the two sides of the table on the terms of the tracking station agreement.

ire Frireleum explained that we shall have to clear any draft with the Governor of the Seychelles and make sure that he was confident of selling it to the Executive Council. The Governor had indicated that this should be possible provided the agreement was shown to be in a standard form in line with previous precedents. Hr. Mitchen draw attention to the fact that the Americans had sade a number of concessions in the draft.

It was ogreed that a discussion of draft C should continue the efternoon, while draft S would be taken tomorrow morning. Draft A would be discussed in a separate sub-committee in the Ministry of Defence.

DEFENCE PACILITIES IN THE INDIAN OCEAN

Resort of a Meeting of U.S. and U.S. Officials on 24 September, 1985, to Discuss Dreft E. Er. Pock in the Chair.

The following points of interest which do not emerge from the record of the two "plenary" meetings were made in dictuosion.

2s Hr. Kitchen explained that the U.S. draft had not been prepared with an eye to publication. They accepted that something would have to be published in due course. The thing might have to be modified to put it in a suitable form for this.

To the third was a second to the the Colonial Office envisaged the detendent operation taking place in three stages. During the first stage normal life would continue on the islands stateded but not yet needed for defence facilities; In the middle stage the population would have to be cleaved off any island when it was needed for defence purposes. This process would take a little time. During the final stage it was envisaged that an island with defence recilities installed on it would be free from local civilian inhabitants.

i. It was agreed that special arrangements would have to be made to cover the middle period when there might be U.S. forces and local inhabitants living for a time on a particular island.

The question of jointly finenced facilities, a entegory not proviously considered, was discussed. Entitles a entegory not they were thinking of a situation in which both parties had a similar requirement in mind and it might be met more expeditiously and economically if the costs were shared. Entitle Fairclows contained that it would greatly asset the problems of resettlement is view of the prevailing unsephopment in Manyitius and the state of the prevailing unsephopment in Manyitius and the state of the constructional phase. Entitle said that they respected the matter sympathetically and were milling to consider using local labour, but only during the constructional phase.

6. There was a lengthy discussion of the problems of jurisdiction over the islands detached. This was continued in the "plenary" meeting.

DEFENCE PACIFITIES IN THE HEDIAR OCEAN

CHAMBERY record of 'Plenery' meeting between the United Kingdom and United States officials (lef by Mr. Kitchen). Mr. Peck in the Chair on 2h September. 1965

En Fairclouch confirmed that at a final meeting with Hamitius Ministers, Dr. Remgoolem and a mejority of Ministers present had arread to the detechant of the Chagos Archivelego in return for agreed compensation. They had been promised an agreement on the external defence of Meuritius, with provision for consultation in the event of internal disorder. Although the position was not yet crystal clear, it was reasonable to assume that there would be no serious difficulty reasonable to assume that there would be no serious difficulty even detechment. In answer to a question shout a future time-thule, he explained that the necessary legal measures would be compensatively quick, but that reactilement and other administrative arrangements might take langer.

It was screen in discussion that the term 'detachment' should be avoided in any public statements on this midject, and that some other phrase - e.g. the retartion of ther Rejecty's Government should be devised in its place.

Mr. Kitchen explained that a review of United States communication requirements made it hard for him to judge when they would be ready to externet facilities on Diego Cercie. The favourable outcome of these discussions would assist progress in Waghington.

Fr. Kitchen caked about British requirements for defence facilities on the inlands. Er. Echerly replied that the only British requirement at procent was for a Navel oil storage depot at Diego Carcia, and that this was still subject to approval.

Fr. Holton reported on results of discussion of Fraft A financial arrangements. They had reached complete agreement subject to

- (a) reference to Covernments;
- (b) any necessary adjustments to working to put the text in a form suitable to a secret understanding;
- (c) consequential adjustments to draft 'A' when the text of draft 'B' had been finally agreed.

The Terrall reported that the sub-committee had reached agreement on all points of substance in Irait 'C' (Ends treaking station). Certain definitions needed expending. The treaking station). Certain definitions needed expending. The united States side had agreed to produce a redraft. He recalled that the Seychelles Executive Council had refused to consider an almost identical draft in 1954, and had demanded a substantial cuid ure one.

He proper explained that in preparing draft 'h', the United States side had not taken account of the need for an interim regime to continue after detachment in the islands not yet needed for defence purposes. It was important that any such arrangements written into the draft should not became the fact that after detachment may of the islands would be evaluable for defence use, as required. They would have to look at this again in Reshington and consider also some provision for mergency defence use of islands not yet required for permanent facilities. They would produce a redraft of the assent sentence of the first paragraph, to cover these two points.

We. Brones went on to exclain that they found difficulty over the Ministry of Defence reduct of (2). Either (2) and physics 'repetitive or (2) seemed unduly rectrictive. The physics 'mutual agreement' was difficult for them.

(2) Was meant to deal with a United States proposel for taking over an island (or part of an island) for the construction of defence facilities. (3) was meant to deal with technical and administrative details.

Er. Fairclough explained that the Colonial Office would be happy if given due notice of United States intent to take over a fresh island.

Hr. Moberly explained that the Ministry of Defence also wanted to be able to look at any such proposal in the light of our can military requirements.

It was spread that the United States side would produce a redwarf taking account of points made in discussion.

Era Broneg soid that the United States side agreed to the emended wording of (5), (6) and (8) (see revised text enclosed). They would look again at (4), as amended by the Britishides of Same provision covering third party use of any jointly financed facilities would be needed here. They would also incorporate in (7) an understanding with respect to the use of look [4.6, Septhalles and Reuritius] labour. (9) covering jurisdiction would need considerable further thought, but the United States would make proposals.

the Beker said that at first sight the arrangements for jurisdiction in the Assension Island agreement would fit.

they envisement explained that if the judicial arrangements purposes - Serialles law administered by the Governor in his capacity as administrator of the new colony - proved actisfactory, they might be extended from this interim period to the final period. If not, they could be changed by the Administrator.

He. Prireloush expisited that some fixed term would help vis-d-vis Maurithus Ministers, who had again raised the question of Chapos reverting to Neuritius if and when no longer requires for Defence purposes. There would be no need to put a reversion clause in the agreement.

Er. Peck turned to arrangements for follow-up action.

It was acreed that we chould keep the United States Embasey Informed of the steps taken by Colonial Offices, and that the American side should provide redrafted passages, as agreed in discussing, through their Embasey Jaco note on further action attached.

We Eitchen concluded by expressing his gratitude for this major decision by Her Emjecty's Coverement which would be of great value to the free world and the West. The discussions had been most useful; we should have a further round (perhaps in Wanhington) if necessary to speed up setion.

Mr. Peck thanked Mr. Kitchen.

MAURITIUS CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE REPORT 1965

INTRODUCTION

- 1. In the final communique of the Mauritius Constitutional review talks in July 1961, two stages of constitutional advance were proposed, on the assumptions:-
 - that constitutional advance towards internal selfgovernment was inevitable and desirable;
 - (ii) that after the introduction of the second stage of constitutional advance following the next general election, Mauritlus would, if all went well, be able to move towards full internal self-government before the next following election; and
 - (iii) that at that time it was not possible to foresee the precise status of Mauritius after full internal selfgovernment had been achieved.

The communique further recorded the general wish that Mauritius should remain within the Commonwealth; but whether as an independent state, or in some form of special association either with the United Kingdom or with other independent Commonwealth countries, was a matter which should be considered during the next few years in the light of constitutional progress generally. A copy of the communique is attached at Annex A.

- 2. The two stages of constitutional advance envisaged in the 1961 communique were duly carried into effect; and when early in 1964 the Mauritius (Constitution) Order 1964 was made and the present all-party government of Mauritius had taken office, the constitutional advances foreshadowed in the 1961 communique were complete. The move to full internal self-government, and the ultimate status to be aimed at, thus become matters for discussion and decision.
- 3. During the discussions early in 1964 leading to the formation of the present all-party government, the timing of a conforence to consider further constitutional advance was considered and it was agreed that this should be at some convenient time after October 1965. Further discussions on the occasion of the Secretary of State's visit to Mauritius in April, however, made it seem probable that a conforence in September 1965 would be acceptable and, particularly in view of the importance of bringing to an end the period of uncertainty in Mauritius as soon as possible, it was decided to convene the conference in September. The Secretary of State's Despatch of the 8th June, 1965 to the Governor conveying an invitation to the Premier and the other leaders of parties represented in the legislature to attend a constitutional conference opening in London on 7th September, 1965 is attached at Annex B.
- 4. The main task of the Conference was to reach agreement on the ultimate status of Mauritius, the timing of accession to it, whether accession should be preceded by consultation with the people, and if so in what form.

THE CONFERENCE

5. The Conference met at Lancaster House under the chairmanship of the Secretary of State for the Colonics, Mr. Anthony Greenwood, from 7th September, 1965 until

Please note that this copy is supplied subject to the National Archives' terms and conditions and that your use of it may be subject to copyright restrictions. Further information is given in the Terms and Conditions of supply of the National Archives' islants.

24th Soptember, 1965, assisted by the Joint Parliamentary Under-Secretary, Lord Taylor. It was attended by representatives of all the political parties in the Mauritius Legislature, namely:

The Mauritius Labour Party (Leader The Hon. Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam) which at the last election won 19 out of the 40 seats in the legislature and polled 42.3% of the votes east.

The Parti Mauricien Social Democrat (Leader The Hon. J. Koenig, Q.C.) which won 8 seats and polled 18.9% of the votes.

The Independent Forward Bloc (Leader The Hon. S. Bissoondoyal) which won 7 seats and polled 19.2% of the votes.

The Muslim Committee of Action (Leader The Hon. A. R. Mohamed) which won 4 seats and polled 7.1% of the votes.

Two independent members of the logislature, The Hon. J. M. Paturau and The Hon. J. Ah Chuen also attended.

A full list of those attending the Conference is attached to this Report.

6. The main debate at the Conference was between the advocates of independence and of continuing association with Britain as the ultimate status of Mauritius. The Scorotary of State for his part had repeatedly indicated that he did not wish to form any view as between these courses in advance of the Conference; that no proposals for the constitutional future of Mauritius were ruled out in edvance; and that he hoped that every effort would be made in proliminary discussions in Mauritius to reach agreement on as many as possible of the matters before the Conference. These varying points of view were brought out in the specicle by the Secretary of State and the leaders of the four Mauritius parties at the opening session. The texts are given in Annex C.

CONSTITUTION

- 7. The Conference recognised that there were a number of matters which would have to be provided for in the constitution of flau Mauritius which would not be affected by the decision on final status. All the delegates agreed to those matters without prejudice to their views on this question. Subject to this reservation on ultimate status, a large measure of agreement was reached on the details of a constitutional framework covering the great majority of these matters. A framework embodying these points and in such a form that it could be used as the basis of the new constitution, whichever way the decision eventually went on ultimate status, is set out in Annex D.
- 8. Since it had proved impossible to reach agreement at the Conference on the electoral system, and the Secretary of State was reluctent to determine such an important matter without further consultation, he decided that a Commission should be appointed to make recommendations to him on:-
 - (i) the electoral system and the method of allocating seats in the Legislature, most appropriate for Mauritius, and

(ii) the boundaries of electoral constituencies.

The Commission should be guided by the following principles:-

- The system should be based primarily on multi-member constituencies. (a)
- Voters should be registered on a common roll; there should be no communal electoral rolls.
- (c) The system should give the main sections of the population an opportunity of securing fair representation of their interests, if necessary by the reservation of seats.
- (d) No encouragement should be afforded to the multiplication of small parties.
- (e) There should be no provision for the nomination of members to seats in the Legislature.
- (f) Provision should be made for the representation of Rodrigues.

9. The Conference also considered the question of Mauritian of direments. It was recognised that should the decision on ultimate status be in favour of independence, the independence constitution would have to include provisions governing citizenship. Moreover, the type of association considered by the Conference involved prevision for Mauritius to move on, by due constitutional process, to full independence without having to seek the approval of the British Government. The British Government would therefore wish to determine, at the time of a decision on association, the arrangements governing Mauritian citizenship if and when a move from associated status to full independence should take place. The Conference discussed the citizenship question against this background, without projudice to their views as to the ultimate status of Mauritius. It was not possible to go into the matter in detail, but the Secretary of State made it plant that the British Government would wish to ensure that general principles adopted in many Commonwealth countries, and set out in Annex E.

10. The position of Munitius civil servents for whom the Secretary of State had responsibility was also considered, in view of the decisions implicit in the constitutional arrangements described in Annex D, that Mauritius should proceed to the stage of full internal self-government and that the Service Commissions should become executive. The Secretary of State informed the Conference that the standard practice was that when a country moved to full internal self-government with executive Service Commissions, and in consequence the Secretary of State's power to continue to carry out his responsibilities towards the power to continue to carry out his responsibilities towards the should be introduced under which the officers concerned would be able to retire with compensation for loss of career prospects. He went on to explain that it would be necessary for the Mauritius Government to agree to the introduction of such a compensation scheme and the related Public Officers Agreement, both following the usual pattern, and in terms satisfactory to the British Government. The details of these arrangements remain to be settled in negotiations between the British and Mauritius

POPULAR CONSULTATION

POPULAR CONSULTATION

11. The Conference devoted a considerable time to consideration of whether advance to ultimate status should, in the words of the Secretary of State's Despatch of Sth June "be preceded by consultation with the people and if so in what form". It was argued that no such consultation was necessary, as the wish of the people of Mauritius for independence had been smply demonstrated by the support accorded in three general elections to parties which favoured independence. It would, however, be appropriate that there should be a fresh general election, under whatever electoral arrangements were agreed upon at the Conference, in advance of independence; and that the government then elected should lead the country into independence on the other hand it was argued that the question of independence had not been a prominent issue in provious general elections and that it was doubtful whether a majority desired it. At general elections, voters directed their attention mainly to ther Issues, and wore distracted by communal considerations. Cases were cited within the Commonwealth where decisions on ultimate status had been made by referendum/ and it was argued that those precedents should be followed in the case of Mauritius.

ULTIMATE STATUS

- 12. In addition to the arguments relating to ultimate status summarised in the preceding paragraph it was also contended that to grant independence would be in accordance with British policy and practice; and that independence was a goal which Britain herself should encourage her dependent territories to attain. Given the universal desire in Mauritius to remain within the Commonwealth and on terms of close friendship with Britain, there was little reason for stopping short of full independence at the hitherts untried intermediate status of association. Finally, it was argued that only through independence could Mauritius achieve unity, and attain membership of the Commonwealth and of the United Nations.
- 13. Against independence and in favour of association it was argued that the results of previous general elections were irrelevant, since independence had not been in issue. There were on the contrary, grounds, in the support accorded in political meetings throughout Mauritius to those advocating association, for doubt whether a mejority of the people wanted independence. Mauritius was too small, isolated, and economically vulnerable to be viable as an independent country. Emphasis was laid on her dependence on sugar exports, and her liability to cyclones. It was further argued that should Britain over accede to the Treaty of Rome and enter the European Economic Community, Mauritius would have a far better chunce of negotiating advantageous errangements with the Community as a territory associated with Britain than if she were independent. The problems of growing population and unemployment in Mauritius, were also emphasised.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S VIEWS

14. In the face of this conflict between the advice afforded to the British Government by the various parties in Mauritius as to the ultimate status of the country and given the general recognition of the importance of terminating as rapidly as possible the recent period of uncertainty, it was clear during the Conference that it would fall to the British Government to make a decision as between independence and association and on the question of popular consultation, without the benefit of unanimous advice from the parties at the Conference.

- 15. The Mauritius Lebour Party and the Independent Forward Bloc, which advocated independence had between them 26 out of the 40 seats in the legislature and the support at the 1963 election of 61.5% of the voters. The Muslim Committee of Action was also prepared to support independence, provided that certain conditions regarding the electoral system were met.
- 16. On the other hand, a significant section of the population, especially in the community known as the General Population, was opposed to independence. In view of the complex composition of the population, the Secretary of State attached great importance to ensuring that full weight was given to the views of the Parti Mauricien delegates and the two independents.
- 17. He concluded, however, that the main effect of the referendum for which they asked would be to prolong the current uncertainty and political controversy in a way which could only harden and deepen communal divisions and rivelries. He therefore came to the conclusion that a referendum would not be in the best interests of Mauritius, and that it was preferable that a decision on ultimate status should be taken at the present Conference.
- 18. The proposals for association developed by the Parti Maurician did not rule out the possibility of Mauritius becoming independent. It was inherent in this form of association, as distinct from the normal colonial relationship, that the territory itself should be free at any time to emend its own constitution and, by due constitutional process, to move on to full independence. Given the known strongth of the support for independence, hower, it was clear that strong prossure for this would be bound to continue and that in such a state of association neither uncertainty nor the acute political controversy about ultimate status would be dispelled.
- 19. The Sccretary of State had throughout the Conference cmphasised the importance that he attached to the constitution containing every possible safeguard against the abuse of power. Discussions at the Conference had shown that there was good ground for believing that such safeguards and many other provisions of the internal scheme of government would command general acceptance, whatever the ultimate status. In considering his final decision, therefore, the Secretary of State felt confident that it would be possible to produce a constitution which would command the support and respect of all parties and of all sections of the population.
- 20. The Scoretary of State accordingly announced at a Plenary meeting of the Conference on Friday, 24th September, his view that it was right that Mauritius should be independent and take her place among the sovereign nations of the world. When the electoral Commission had reported, a date would be fixed for a general election under the new system, and a new Government would be formed. In consultation with this Government, Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to fix a date and take the necessary steps to declare Mauritius independent, after a period of six months full internal self-government if a resolution asking for this was passed by a simple majority of the new Assembly. Her Majosty's Government would expect that those processes could be completed before the end of 1966.

21. It would be the British Government's intention, in preparing the draft of the Independence Constitution, to recommend the inclusion in it of the provisions set out in the constitutional framework in Annex D to this Report. This scheme had been dayised to take the fullest possible account of the views expressed by delegates at the Conference. In addition to these provisions, however, and in consequence of the decision that the ultimate status of Mauritius will be Independence, it will be necessary to include in the Independence Constitution additional arrangements for the appointment and removal of ambassadors, high commissioners and principal representatives abroad of Mauritius. The usual arrangements would be followed and appointment and removal in respect of those offices would take place on the advice of the Prime Minister, who would consult the Public Service Commission before tendering advice in cases where career civil servants were involved.

22. The Secretary of State also referred to discussions he had had with the individual Parties regarding the adoption of cortain constitutional practices concerning the appointment and tenure of effice of the Queen's representative und an independent Mauritius. The Queen's representative would have special responsibilities which he would exercise in his personal discretion, and the Secretary of State stressed that it was of fundamental importance to make special arrangements protecting the impertiality of the Queen's representative. The individual Parties to the Conference should be adopted. In making his recommendation for the appointment of the Queen's representative, the Prine Minister would take all reasonable stops to ensure that the person appointed would be generally acceptable in Mauritius as a person who would not be swayed by political or communal considerations; it would be for the Trime Minister of the day to make arrangements to give effect to this practice. In the case of the recommendation to Hor Majesty for the speciation of the first Governor General of an independent Mauritius, the person appointed would come from outside Mauritius and the name would be agreed between the British Government and the Prime Minister before it was submitted to Hor Majesty. Once appointed, the Governor General would, unless he resigned, be permitted to continue in office for his full term unless a recommendation was made to Her Majesty for the termination of his appointment on medical grounds established by an importial tribunal appointed by the Chief Justice.

23. At this final Plenary mooting of the Conference the Secretary of State also indicated that the British Government had given careful consideration to the views expressed as to the desirability of a defence agreement being entered into between the British and Mouritius Governments covering not only defence against external threats but also assistance by the British Government in certain circumstences in the event of threats to the internal security of Mauritius. The Secretary of State announced that the British Government was willing in principle to negotiate with the Mauritius Government before independence the terms of a defence agreement which would be signed and come into effect immediately after independence. The British Government envisaged that such an agreement might provide that, in the event of an external threat to either country, the two governments would consult together to decide what action was necessary for mutual defence. There would also be joint on any request from the Mauritius Government in the event of a threat to the internal security of Mauritius. Such an agreement would contain provisions under which on the one hand the British Government would undertake to assist in the provision of training for, and the secondment of trained personnel to, the Mauritius police and security forces; and on the other hand the Mauritius Government would agree to the continued enjoyment by Britain of existing rights and facilities in H.M.S. Mauritius and at Flaisance Airfield.

24. As regards membership of the Commonwealth, the Secretary of State referred at the final Plenary session to the general desire expressed to him by all parties that Mauritius should remain within the Commonwealth. He made it plain that, as delegates would appreciate, the question of membership of the Commonwealth was a matter not for the British Government alone but for the members of the Commonwealth as a whole to decide. He indicated that the British Government would be happy.if the desire of Mauritius for membership of the Commonwealth were confirmed by a resolution of the legislature elected at the general election which was to be held before independence, to transmit such a request to other Commonwealth governments.

25. Finally the Secretary of State underlined the importance attached by Britain to the maintenance of the close and friendly relations which had existed between Britain and Mauritius for ever 150 years. The achievement of independence would, in his belief, strengthen rather than weaken those ties of friendship. Mauritius would naturally continue to be cligible for economic assistance from Britain, in the same way as other formerly dependent territories and would still benefit from the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement.

26. The Secretary of State said that he felt sure that all the political parties represented at the Conference and every men and weman in Mauritius would loyally accept the decision that Mauritius should become independent, and would co-operate in making a success of the new constitutional arrangements.

ANNEX A

The following final communique was approved at the sixth and final Plenary Session of the Kauritius Constitutional Review Talks at the Colonial Office today, Friday (July 7, 1961), with the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Iaih Macleod) in the chair:-

At the invitation of the Secretary of State for the Colonies representatives of the Mauritius Labour Party, the Independent Forward Bloc, the Muslim Committee of Action, the Parti Mauricien and two independent members of the Mauritius Legislative Council met in London from June 26 to July 7 to exchange views on the present Constitution and to discuss the extent, the form and timing of any changes. Sir Colville Deverell, the Governor of Mauritius, and Professor S.A. de Smith, the Constitutional Commissioner, were present throughout the talks.

- 2. After an initial plenary meeting and separate and frank discussions with each of the groups the Scoretary of State tabled proposals which were discussed at two plenary sessions. In the light of the comments made upon them by delegates, the proposals were further modified by the Scoretary of State and discussed at further plenary sessions on July 5 and 6.
- 3. The proposals are based on the assumption that constitutional advance in Mauritius towards internal self-government is inevitable and desirable; that the extent and timing of any advance must take into account the heterogeneity of the population and include provisions for adequate safeguards for the liberties of individuals and the interests of the various communities. It is that and not any lack of talent or aptitude for government which conditions the pace of advance in Mauritius.
- 4. Two stages of advance are proposed. The first stage is to be brought into operation as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. The second stage presents a broad basis of the constitution for adoption after the next Genaral Election and in the light of that Election if, following an affirmative vote by the Legislative Council, they are recommended to the Secretary of State by the Chick Minister. On the assumption that the second stage is implemented after the next General Election, it would be expected that during the period between the next two General Elections or what has been called the Second Stage, if all goes well and if it seems generally desirable, Maunitius should be able to move towards full internal self-government.
- 5. It is not possible at this stage to suggest what should be the precise status of Mauritius after the attainment of full internal self-government. It is the general wish that Mauritius should remain within the Commonwealth. Whether this should be schieved as an independent state, or in some form of special association either with the United Kingdom or with then independent commonwealth countries, are matters which should be considered during the next few years in the light of constitutional progress generally.
- The changes proposed are:-

First Stage

(1) The Leader of the Majority Party in the Legislature would be given the title of Chief Minister.

- (2) The Governor would consult the Chief Minister on such matters as the appointment and removal of Ministers, the allocation of portfolios and the summoning, proroguing, and dissolution of the Council. It would be understood that in general he would not be bound to accept the Chief Minister's advice but that he would act on the advice of the Chief Minister in the appointment or removal of Ministers belonging to the Chief Minister's party.
- (3) An additional unofficial ministerial post would be created. The new Ministry would have responsibility for Posts and Telegraphs, Telecommunications, The Central Office of Information and the Broadcasting Service.
- (4) The Colonial Secretary would be re-styled "Chief Secretary".

Second Stage

(1) Executive Council

- (a) The Council would be called the Council of Ministers.
- (b) The Chief Minister would be given the title of Premier.
- (c) The Premier would be appointed by the Governor in accordance with the conventions obtaining in the United Kingdom; that is to say, the Premier would be the person who, in the opinion of the Governor, was most likely to be able to command the support of the majority of members of the Legislature.
- (d) The Council would not be a purely Majority Party government but as at present would include representatives of other Parties or elements which accepted the invitation to join the Government and the principle of collective responsibility.
- (e) In appointing Ministers from groups other than the Premier's Party, the Governor would act in his discretion but would consult with the Premier and such other persons as he deemed fit to consult.
- (f) The Financial Secretary would cease to be a member of the Council.
- (g) Provision would be made for the post of Attorney General to be filled by an Official or by an unofficial Minister. In the former case the holder would cease to be a member of the Council but would continue to be available to attend meetings as an Adviser. In the latter case it would be necessary to create a new official post of Director of Public Prosecutions who would be zelely responsible in his discretion for the initiation, conduct and discontinuance of prosecutions and would in this respect be independent of the Attorney General.
- (h) The Chief Secretary would continue to be a member of the Council and would become in addition to his substantive appointment Minister for Home Affairs.
- An Unofficial Deputy Minister for Home Affairs would be appointed.

(2) Legislative Council

- (a) The Council would be re-named the Legislative Assembly.
- (b) The Assembly would contain 40 elected members. The maximum number of nominated members would be increased to 15. It is contempleted that two or three of these appointments should be hold in reserve.
- (c) The Speaker would be elected by the Legislative Assembly from among its members but this provision would only become effective on the retirement of the present Speaker.
- (d) The Financial Secretary and (if the post were held by an Official) the Attorney General would cease to be members of the Legislative Assembly.
- (e) The Governor in his discretion would summon, prorogue and dissolve the Assembly after consultation with the Premier.

(3) The Public Service, Police Service and Judiciary

- (a) The Public Service and Police Service Commissions and the proposed Judicial and Legal Service Commission would remain advisory to the Governor. The Governor would however be required to consult the Premior in respect of certain appointments viz. Permanent Secretary (or by whatever title the senior administrative officer in a Ministry is described) and Heads of Departments.
- (b) The Chairman and members of the Commissions would continue to be appointed by the Governor in his discretion.
- (c) The Membership and procedure of the Commissions, in the second stage, would so far as possible be conducive to the development of those bodies in such a way as to enable them to become fully executive.
- (d) During the life of the Legislative Assembly following the next General Election the Service Genmissions would become executive. At this stage, while the Cheirmen and Members of the Commission would continue to be appointed by the Governor in his discretion, he would be required to consult the Premier in respect of those appointments.
- (a) The appointment of the Chief Justice would remain as at present.
 - (4) External Affairs, Defence and Internal Security
- (a) These matters would remain within the responsibility of the Governor who would however consult with the Premier about these matters.
- (b) The operational control of the Police and Special Force would continue to be the responsibility of the Commissioner under authority of the Governor.

(5) Human Rights

The Constitution would include provision for the safeguarding of human rights and fundamental freedoms and for the redress of infringements of these rights and freedoms in the courts.

- 7. The Independent Forward Bloc and the Parti Maurician, for reasons which they gave in full to the conference, were unable to accept the Secretary of State's proposals.
- 8. The Muritius Labour Party considered that the proposals did not provide the measure of advance which they were fully justified in claiming. They were, however, prepared to accept them, if reluctantly, as a compromise, on the recommendation of Her Majesty's Government, in the best interests of Mauritius.
- 9. The Muslim Committee of Action did not consider that the proposals adequately safeguarded the interests of the Muslim community. Reluctantly, however, and as a compromise, they too were propared to accept them in the general interest of Mauritius as a whole.
- 10. The two independent members considered that it would not be we in present circumstances to go beyond the proposals put forward by the Secretary of State. They recognized that some measure of advance was inevitable and as the cloaterate would be given an opportunity of expressing its views before the second and more important stage was introduced, they too accepted them.
- 11. The Secretary of State informed the Conference that while it was clear that unanimous agreement could not be reached, in his view a sufficient measure of acceptance had been indicated to justify his recommending the adoption of his proposals.
- 12. Certain delegates proposed the creation of a "Council of State" or "high-powered Tribunal". The functions and composition of such a body would, however, present problems of some complexity and would need careful study. The Secretary of State proposed to address a despatch to the Governor giving his considered views on this, after consultation with the Constitutional Commissioner. The Secretary of State would at the same time indicate the arrangements which could be made to ensure that the Information and Broadcasting Services should continue to operate on a non-partisan basis.
- 13. It was agreed that consideration should be given at a later stage to the question whether a visit to Mauritius by the Constitutional Commissioner, Professor de Smith, would be valuable in examining in greater detail the broad conclusions of the Conference and considering particular appears which had not come within its scope.

ANNEX B

I have the honour to address you on the subject of the future constitutional development of Mauritius. During my recent visit I had extensive alsoussions with the Premier and the leaders of all the parties represented in the Legislature. I am most grateful to them and to many others who were good enough to give me their views on the problems which now confront the people of Mauritius.

- 2. The overriding impression with which I was left was the need to end as quickly as possible the present period of uncertainty. Divergent views are current as to the direction which future constitutional development should take; and it is understandable that until firm decisions can be reached, based upon the widest possible measure of agreement, there should persist a malaise which has doubtless contributed to recent civil disturbances, of which I have learned with distress, and which are foreign to the reputation for goodwill and orderly behaviour which Mauritius has earned over many years.
- 3. You will recall that it was agreed at the talks held in London under the Chairmanship of Lord Lansdowne in February 1964 that the next conference should be held "during the third year counting from the eloctions held in October 1963, i.e. at any convenient time after October 1965". It happens that I should not be free, because of other commitments, to preside at a Conference in October, though I could do so in the early part of September. I should be grateful therefore if, on my behalf, you would convey to the Fremier, and to the other leaders of Parties represented in the legislature, an invitation to attend a Constitutional Conference in London during September, and suggest to them that Tuesday, 7th September would be an appropriate date for the opening session. I should welcome your early recommendations as to the numbers of representatives which the various Parties should bring.
- 4. With regard to the Agenda of the Conforence, paragraphs 4 and 5 of the 1961 Communique indicate the range of matters for discussion. It will be for delegates to advise me as to whether it is the wish of the people of Mauritius to go ahead, in the words of paragraph 5 of the communique "as an independent state, or in some form of special association either with the United Kingdom or with other independent Commonwealth countries"; and I wish to make it plain that no proposals for the constitutional future of the island are ruled out in advance.
- 5. It does appear however that consideration of the question of the ultimate status of Mauritius has now reached the point where specific alternatives are emerging. The main task of the Conference should therefore be to endeavour to reach agreement on this status, the timing of accession to it, whether such accession should be preceded by consultation with the people, and if so in what form. The Conference will of course also consider the changes in the constitution required by full internal self-government, it being understood that these may well be affected by the final view reached on the question of future status. The electoral system and any constitutional changes which this might involve would also have to be decided upon and Professor le Smith's report will provide a useful basis for discussion.

Please note that this copy is supplied subject to the National Archives learns and conditions and that your use of it may be subject to copyright restrictions. Further information is given in the Terms and Conditions of supply of the National Archives Tearlies.

- 6. Before leaving Mauritius I expressed to you, and to the leaders of the main parties separately, the urgent hope that they would use the period before the Conference for serious thought and discussion with one anothor, so as to reach agreement locally, where possible, and to identify the more difficult points which would need to be resolved at the Conference. I hope that the all-party Government may find it possible to subscribe to a single document setting out the areas of agreement and disagreement. You undertook to do all you could to further preliminary discussions to this end, and I trust that it will be possible to do much useful preparatory work in this way. I believe that if the Party leaders will co-operate with you in setting practical discussions of this kind in motion, that will of itself do much to reduce the tension which has been so evident.
- to reduce the tension which has been so evident.

 7. In connection with these preliminary discussions a number of particular points arise. In regard to the Labour Party's proposals, I note that a desire has been expressed for a continuing close link with Britain; if by this is meant some special relationship with Britain over and above the relationship all members of the Commonwealth have with each other, I am sure that it would be valuable if before the Conference the implications of such a relationship could be worked out in some detail; similarly, if the Labour Party contemplated suggesting further safeguards for minorities, it would I am sure be helpful if these could be formulated now. As regards the Parti Maurician's proposals, reference has been made to both "integration" and "association", and some of their detailed proposals appear more akin to the former, others to the latter. It would I am sure be of assistance if further clarification of the Parti Maurician's wishes could be obtained and if the distinction between the concepts of integration and association could be recognised. As regards the Independent Forward Bloc and the Muslim Committee of Action, these parties would no doubt also welcome further clarification of the Labour Party's and the Parti Maurician's proposals and, in defining their own particular wishes, would no doubt wish to consider how best these might be reconciled with the main alternatives which so far appear to be under discussion.
- 8. In the short remaining period before the Conference a heavy responsibility rosts on everyone in Mauritius, and perticularly on the Party leaders; the Fress, and all who are in a position to influence opinion, to think of the interests of Mauritius as a whole, and to avoid doing or saying anything that might increase tension between sections of all communities.

STATEMENT BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE

"I should like to begin by thanking you all for accepting my invitation to come to this conference. This is a moment to which I have looked forward with pleasure for nearly a yeer, and still more eagerly since my visit to your idyllic country

I feel now that I can welcome you, not just formally and politically, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, but elso in terms of personal friendship as one who knows and loves the people of Mauritius and who knows and respects their leaders.

May I therefore welcome you all very warmly to this conference on the constitutional future of your country. I only wish I had been able to provide the same overwhelming reception for everyone of you that you arranged for me when I drove from the Airport to Le Reduit.

This is a conference which the people of our two countries, bound closely together for over 150 years, will watch with eager interest, praying that there will emerge from it a generally acceptable solution which will give Mauritius a secure, prosperous, and happy future. When there is so much strife in the world it is incumbent upon us all to narrow the areas of disagreement and to remove possible causes of friction. And I know that in the talks ahead we shall all of us keep before us one clear goal - quite simply, what is best for Mauritius and her people as a whole.

Before I refer to the subject matter of the conference may I make two personal points. First, I know that everyone around the table will have shared my delight that the Premier should have been honoured by Her Majesty The Queen. It is an honour, Mr. Premier, which was richly deserved and which delighted your friends throughout the Commonwealth who hold in high esteem your statesmanship and wisdom.

I should also like to say how sorry I have been to learn that some of my friends here have experienced ill-health since we last met. I am very glad to see Mr. Koenig, your Attorney General and leader of the Perti Meuricien, Mr. Ringadoo, Minister of Education, and Mr. Devienne, Minister of State, with us today and I hope that their health is fully restored, and that the proceedings of our conference will not be so arduous as to put any undue strain upon them.

This conference has its origin in the series of constitutional talks held under the chairmanship of Mr. Macleod, in 1961. The constitutional advances agreed upon them have been carried smoothly into effect with general agreement and goodwill. The 1961 talks, and the London talks eighten months ago on the formation of the present all-party Government, looked forward to the present conference.

What emerges from these facts of recent history, however, that I would like principally to stress is that the background against which this conference is being held is one of gradual and steady progress achieved by discussion and agreement. Mauritius is a sophisticated and politically sensitive community. Despite many differences, it has always been possible for the leaders of the various perties and communities in the end to reach agreement, and I have every confidence that this enviable record will continue an unbroken one when we conclude our present labours.

Further information is given in the Terms and Conditions of supply of the National Archives' leaflets

Ever since I visited you in April, I have stressed both in public and in private that I would not prejudge in any way the outcome of the present conference. No solutions have been ruled out in advance. I adopted this point of view partly because I do not think that it is right that the British Government, although it has ultimate constitutional responsibilities, should attempt to lay down in advance constitutional solutions for highly developed communities many thousends of miles away - those days are far behind us: but also I took this line because I know of Mauritius's record of working out solutions by discussion and negotiation between her political leadors. I felt, and still feel, that this is the best possible way to reach durable agreements on constitutional matters. For this reason, too, I urged upon you when I visited Mauritius, and have since continued to press upon you, the necessity for discussing the issues arising and endeavouring to reach agreement amongst yourselves.

This still remains my position. I still regard it as being of primery importance that you in the Mauritius Delegation should agree between yourselves upon the constitutional steps you went your country to take. You who live in Mauritius and who represent the various communities that make up its population are the best judges of how you can live together in peace and friendship which I know is what you all wish.

I conceive my role at this conference and that of Her Majesty's Government as being one of counseller and friend. We in the Colonial Office, as you know, have a good deal of experience of constitutional conferences and of constitutions, in practice; of means of meeting particular situations and perticular problems; and of devising machinery which can resolve doubts and set fears at rest. We shall seek to help in this way during this conference. Between us I hope thet we can ensure that Mauritius's multiplicity of races, far from being a source of weakness, is, as it should be, a source of strength.

In these few opening remarks I shall not attempt to discuss the verious constitutional steps which will be before us at the conference. We shall have to go into the implications of the possible courses in considerable detail. The basic issues we shall have to tackle are well enough known to you all and to the world at large.

I will only say now that I regard it as being of the utmost importance that our discussions at this conference should end in an agreement on the course to be pursued which can be wholeheartedly supported by all the parties represented here. Only in that way can the plan agreed upon, whatever it may be, be honestly advocated by all of you, the political leaders, to your constituents, the people of all the communities which make up the population of Mauritius.

If we can succeed in this we shall have done well, and the people of Mauritius will have cause to be thankful for what between us, we have achieved on their behalf."

STATEMENT BY SIR R. SHEWOOSAGUR RAMGOOLAM

"On behelf of the Mauritius Labour Perty and in my own name I wish to thank you, Sir, for the very warm welcome you have extended to us. We are also grateful to you personally for having called this conference so that we may remove uncertainty, and colonialism and bring about independence to the people of Mauritius.

The proposals of the Mauritius Labour Party have been embodded in a memorandum which has been communicated to you. They represent a summary of our views on the constitutional changes which are required for the effective establishment of independence with guaranteed safeguards for the minorities. The Mauritius Labour Party which, by its constitution and actual working, represents a complete cross-section of Mauritian society, has received a clear mandate for independence from the people of Mauritius at the last three general elections. You have plented the Rule of Law in Mauritius and are now being invited to complete the process by the establishment of full democracy.

The Mauritius Labour Party wants the independence of Mauritius within the Commonwealth with a Governor-General appointed by Her Majesty The Queen, and with a Cabinet form of government. It is hoped that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to become Queen of Mauritius.

The Mauritius Labour Party accepts the automatically operated best-loser system and at the same time it is prepared to consider any alternative which would secure adequate representation of the Muslim and Chinese minorities. We are also in favour of the creation of an ombudeman.

At this stage it is not necessary for me to go into a detailed examination of our proposals which are most orthodix and in line with the constitutional status of other countries which have acceded to independence within the Commonwealth, but I would like to say that the memorandum of the Mauritius Labour Party adumbrates the main principles governing our stand at this constitutional conference.

As you have said, Mr. Secretary of State, we are meeting here as friends and as a family, and we are hopeful that goodwill, understanding and wisdom will prevail at this conference and that Mauritius will emerge from it as an independent nation. To my mind it is incumbent upon the British people to help us in this march forward.

In concluding, I share with you the feeling of joy that my friend the Attorney General, my oldest friend of the Assembly, has now recovered end would wish that he will be even better as the conference proceeds. I would like to say the same for my friend the Minister of Education, Mr. Ringadoc and my friend the Minister of State, Mr. Devienne.

Finally, Sir, I am very sensible of the congretulations that you have given on the occasion of my having received the Knighthood from Her Majesty.

With these words I think I have nothing more to add except that I am personally hoping that all will go well ahead."

STATEMENT BY THE HON. J. KOENIG, Q.C.

"I would like to thank you on behalf of my colleagues and myself for the kind words addressed to us, and I should like at the same time to thank my friend, Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, for the very nice words he addressed to me.

We, Mauritians, have been loyal subjects of Her Majesty since 1810. We have Stock by Britain in the dark days of two World Wars and have, in a modest but unstinting way, played our part in the defence of democracy and of the free world.

If we contend that de-colonisation there must be, we discard independence as being fatal to the prosperity and the peaceful and harmonious development of Mauritius as part of the free world.

We claim that it is the general wish of the people of Mauritius that as a substitute for independence, close constitutional associations with Great Britain should be maintained within the framework of a new pattern. We believe that the people of Mauritius must in any event have the right to express their preference in a

The United Nations Charter recognises our right to self-determination and we are confident, Sir, that this right will be readily conceded to us by Great Britain."

STATEMENT BY THE ON. A. R. MOHAMED

STATEMENT BY THE ON. A. R. MOHAMED

"On behelf of my party, I associate myself with my other friends who have just been speaking to thank Her Majesty's Government for having kindly asked us to be here to decide the future of our Colony, in other words, of our country. Sir, you have just spoken about our past association with Her Majesty's Government, and, on behalf of the Whelim population of Mauritlus, I would like to say it is our real wish that our past association of 150 years with the British Government will continue for many more centuries to come. Speaking as a delegate to this conference, I consider it my bounden duty to declare, and declare it very clearly, that the Muslims of Mauritius have always co-operated with others for the good of the country, and they are ready to co-operate in the future. We are not against any political and constitutional progress of our country provided such progress does not mean the oppression of any community in Mauritiue, and because of this and other reasons I also want to make it clear that we will have to see that our political and other rights are safeguarded and that we be charity of others."

STATEMENT BY THE HON. S. BISSOONDOYAL

"I have not much to say on this occasion apart from thanking you for the very magnificent hospitality you have accorded to all the delegates from Mauritius. I have to emphasise the thankfulness of my party for the visit both of you, Sir, and of Professor de Smi and when I refer to Professor de Smith I am referring to the proposal for the appointment of an embudsman.

Before resuming my seat, I will ask this Government to see to it that no mischievous report reaches Mauritius as it did last time and that a strict importiality will be observed. I say this because I see the man whom I believe to be responsible for that the last time is present in this house."

ANNEX D

THE CONSTITUTIONAL FRAMEWORK

Fundamental rights

The Constitution will include a Chapter providing for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual which will follow closely chapter 1 of the existing Constitution, $\not=$

- The Chapter on fundamental rights will contain such modifications as are necessary to secure that any religious, social, ethnic or cultural association or group will have the right to establish and maintain schools at its own expense, subject to any reasonable restrictions which may be imposed by law in the interests of persons receiving instruction in such schools, and that a perent will not be prevented from sending a child to such a school merely on the ground that the school is not a school established or maintained by the Government.
- 5. Derogations may be made from the provisions protecting fundamental rights by the Mauritius Government and legislature in relation to a state of war or other public emergency but only to the extent and in accordance with the procedure set out below:
 - (a) Derogations from the fundamental rights will only be permissible under a law during a public emergency and will be limited to derogations from the right to personal liberty or the protection of freedom from discrimination which are reasonably justifiable in the circumstances of the situation.
 - (b) A period of public emergency for this purpose will be a period when Mauritius is at war or when the Gueen's Representative, acting on the advice of Ministers, has issued a proclamation declaring that a state of public emergency exists.
 - (c) When the Legislative Assembly is sitting, or when arrangements have already been made for it to meet within seven days of the date of the proclamation, the proclamation will lapse unless within seven days the Assembly approves the proclamation.
 - (d) When the Legislative seembly is not sitting and is not due to meet within seven days, the proclemation will lapse unless within twenty-one days it meets and gives its approval by a resolution supported by at least two-thirds of all the members.
 - (e) The proclamation, if approved by resolution, will remain in force for such period not exceeding six months as the Assembly may specify in the resolution.

It was noted by the Conference that the provisions in Chapter 1 of the existing Constitution containing protection against discrimination did not preclude the enactment of laws applicable to Muslims only relating to marriage, divorce and the devolution of property; the Conference accepted in principle that steps should be taken towards the introduction of Muslim personal law in respect of these matters into Nauritius.

(f) The Assembly will be empowered to extend the operation of the proclamation for further periods, not exceeding six months at a time and a resolution for this purpose will also require the support of at least two thirds of all the members of the Assembly.

Provision will be made for the periodic review of the case of persons who have been detained in derogation in the right of personal liberty by an independent and impartial tribunal and a detained person will have the right to information as to the ground on which he is detained, to consult a legal representative and to appear in person or by a legal representative before the reviewing tribunal.

4. The Queen's Representative

The Queen's Representative will be appointed by Her Majesty and, subject to Her Majesty's pleasure, will hold office during his period of appointment.

- 5. The functions of the queen's Representative will be discharged during a vacancy, an illness or absence of the representative by such person as Her Majesty may appoint, or if there is no such person as Her Maje ty may appoint, or if there is no such person appointed in Mauritius, by the Chief Justice.
- 6. The Queen's Representative will, in the exercise of his functions, act on the advice of the Council of Ministers or an individual Minister acting with the general authority of the Council of Ministers except in cases where he is required by the Constitution or a law to act on the advice of some other person or authority or to act in his personal discretion. The chief minister will keep the Queen's Representative informed concerning matters of government.

7. The Council of Ministers

There will be a Council of Ministers which will be collectively responsible to the Legislature. The Council of Ministers will consist of a chief minister and not more than Ul other ministers; subject to this limit, the number of ministers will be determined from time to time by the Queen's Representative on the advice of the chief minister.

- 8. The Queen's Representative, acting in his personal discretion, will appoint as chief minister a member of the Legislative Assembly who appears to him likely to command the support of the majority of the members of the Assembly. The ministers, other than the chief minister, will be appointed from among the members of the Assembly on the advice of the chief minister.
- 9. The queen's Representative will be empowered to remove the chief minister from office if a vote of no confidence in his government is passed in the Lagislative Assembly and he does not within 3 days resign or advise a dissolution, and also, following a general election, where the queen's Representative considers that as a result of the election the chief minister will not be able to command a majority in the new Assembly. Any other minister will vacate office if the queen's Representative revokes his appointment on the advice of the chief minister, if the chief minister goes out of office in consequence of a vote of no confidence or on the appointment of any person to be chief minister. The chief minister and any other minister will vacate office if he ceases to be a member of the Legislative Assembly toherwise than by reason of a dissolution or if, at the first meeting of the Assembly following a dissolution, he is not a member of the Assembly.
- 10. The chief minister will preside in and summon the Council of Ministers and portfolios will be allocated to ministers on his advice.

- 11. There will be provision in the Constitution for the appointment of a minister to carry out the functions of the chief minister when the chief minister is unable to act because of illness or absence from Mauritius. Such an appointment will be made by the Queen's representative on the chief minister's advice unless it is impracticable to obtain this advice because the chief minister is too ill or is absont, in which case the Queen's representative will make the appointment without obtaining advice.
- 12. The Constitution will provide for the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries, whose number will not exceed five. A Parliamentary Secretary will be appointed on the advice of the chief minister from among the members of the Legislative Assembly and will hold office on the same terms as a minister, (other than the chief minister).

13. The Legislature

The Logislature will consist of Her Majesty and the Legislative Assembly. The Logislative Assembly will consist of elected members. The Constitution will provide for the electoral system:

- 14. The provisions for the franchise and for the qualifications and disqualifications for election to the Logislative Assembly and for the Speakor and Deputy Speakor will follow the corresponding provisions in the existing Constitution. The official language of the Legislative Assembly will be English but any member will be able to address the chair in French.
- 15. The Constitution will provide for the establishment of an Electoral Boundaries Commission which will review the boundaries of the constituencies every ten years or, if the Commission considers it necessary after the holding of a census, and to make recommendations to the Logislative Assembly. The members of the Commission will be appointed by the Queen's representative on the advice of the chief minister after the latter has consulted the leader of the opposition. The principles which the Commission will be required to apply will be specified in the Constitution. The recommendations of the Commission as to the alteration of the boundaries of the constitutions will be submitted to the Legislative Assembly which may approve them or reject them but may not alter the recommendation; if approved by the Assembly, they will become operative upon the next
- 16. The Constitution will also provide for an Electoral Commissioner who will be a public officer and will be appointed by the Judicial and Legal Service Commission. The functions of the Electoral Commissionor will be to supervise the compilation of electoral rogisters and the holding of elections. The Electoral Commissioner will have security of tenure similar to that of a judge, i.e. his retiring age will be prescribed by the Constitution and he will not be removable except on the grounds of inability or misbehaviour and after there has been an enquiry by a tribunal consisting of persons who are or have been judges and the tribunal has recommended his removal. Any proceedings for the removal of the Electoral Commissioner will be initiated by the Judicial and Legal Service Commission.
- 17. The office of leader of the opposition will be established by the Constitution. Appointments to this office will be made by the Queen's representative acting in his personal discretion.

+See paragraph 8 of the Report from among the members of the Logislative Assembly and he will be guided by provisions in the Constitution as to the person to be selected for appointment to this office. The Queen's representative, acting in his personal discretion, will have power to revoke the appointment of the leader of the opposition if he ceases to fulfil the qualifications specified in the Constitution, and the office of leader of the opposition will also become vacant if another person is appointed to the office after a dissolution of the Legislature, or if he ceases to be a member of the Legislative Assembly otherwise than by reason of a dissolution.

18. Bills passed by the Legislative Assembly will be assented to by the Queen's representative on the advice of the Council of Ministers.

19. The life of the Legislature will be 5 years but there will be provision under which the Legislature may extend its life during any period of war for 12 months at a time, up to a maximum of 5 years. The power of the Queen's representative in relation to the dissolution of the Legislature will be exercised on the advice of the chief minister, but the Queen's representative will have power in his personal discretion to dissolve the Legislature if the Legislative Assembly passes a vote of no confidence in the government and the chief minister does not either resign or recommend a dissolution, and the Queen's representative will also be required to dissolve the Legislature if the office of the chief minister is vacant and the Queen's representative considers that there is no prospect of his being able, within a reasonable time, to appoint a chief minister who can command a majority in the Legislative Assembly.

20. The Judicature

The Constitution will continue to provide for the Supreme Court. The judges of the court will be a Chief Justice, a senior Puisne Judge and other Puisne Judges. The qualifications for appointment will be prescribed in the Constitution, and will follow the present qualifications.

- 21. The Chief Justice will be appointed by the Queen's representative in his personal discretion after consultation with the chief minister. The senior puisne judge will be appointed by the Queen's representative on the advice of the Chief Justice. The other judges of the Supreme Court will be appointed by the Queen's representative on the advice of the Judicial and Legal Service Commission.
- 22. The security of tenure of the judges of the Supreme Court will be protected by provision on the same lines as exists in the present Constitution. The procedure for removing a judge will be initiated by the Queen's representative, acting in his personal discretion, in the case of the Chief Justice and by the Chief Justice in the case of the other judges of the Supreme Court.
- 23. There will be a Judicial and Logal Service Commission established by the Constitution. The Commission will be composed of the Chicf Justice (as Chairman), the senior Puisne Judge, the Chairman of the Public Service Commission and an appointed member selected from persons who are or have been judges. "The appointed member of the Commission will be appointed by the Queen's representative on the advice of the Chief Justice; he will held effice for a period of 3 years and will be removable only on the grounds of inability or misbehaviour after a tribunal consisting of persons who are or have been judges have investigated any complains against the member and recommend his removal; the procedure for removing the appointed member will be initiated by the Queen's representative on the advice of the Chief Justice. The Commission will have the power to make appointments and exercise powers of discipline and removal in respect of the same offices as are now included in Schedule 2 to the existing Constitution, (with the exception of the Director of Public Prosecutions).

24. The Constitution will provide for the Supreme Court to have unlimited original jurisdiction to hear and determine any civil or criminal proceedings under any law. It will also confer on the Supreme Court jurisdiction to supervise civil or criminal proceedings before all subordinate courts, with power to issue the necessary orders, etc. for the purpose.

25. The Constitution will provide for an appeal as of right to the Privy Council from final decisions of the Supreme Court on questions as to the interpretation of the Constitution, and will also include provision for rights of appeal from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council in other cases (which will follow the existing rights of appeal to the Privy Council from decisions of the Supreme Court in ordinary civil and criminal cases)

26. There will be included in the Constitution rights of appeal from the subordinate courts to the Supreme Court. These rights of appeal will include appeals from decisions of the subordinate courts on the interpretation of the Constitution and minimum rights of appeal in ordinary civil and oriminal proceedings based on the rights of appeal which exist at present under Mauritius Ordinances.

27. The Director of Public Prosecutions

The Constitution will establish the office of Director of Public Proscottions who will have independent powers in relation to criminal proscottions corresponding to those vested in the Director by the existing Constitution. A person will not be qualified to be or act as Director unless he is qualified for appointment as a Supreme Court judge. The Director will be appointed by the Judicial and Logal Service Commission. His security of tenure will be similar to that of a judge.

28. The Public Service

There will be a Public Service Commission which will be composed of a Chairman and four other members. Members of a candidates for election to the Legislative Assembly or any local authority will be diaqualified for appointment. Appointments to the Commission will be made by the Queen's representative acting in his personal discretion after consulting the chief minister and the leader of the opposition. The term of office of the members of the Commission will be 3 years. The members of the Commission will be 3 years. The members of the Commission will be removable in the same manner and in the same circumstances as the appointed member of the Judicial Service Commission, except that the procedure for removal will be intitiated by the Queen's representative acting in his personal discretion.

- 29. The Public Service Commission will have powers of appointment, discipline and removal in respect of all public offices (other than those coming under enother Service Commission or those offices for which other provision is made in the Constitution). The Commission will be authorised to delegate any of its powers to a member of the Commission or a public officer.
- 30. Permanent Secretaries will be appointed by the Public Service Commission, but the Commission will be obliged to inform the chiof minister of any proposed appointment and the chief minister will have the right to veto the appointment. Transfers between the offices of permanent Secretary which carry the same emcluments will be made on the advice of the chief minister.
- 31. The retirement benefits of public officers will be guaranteed by the Constitution against unfavourable alteration. Reduction or withholding of the pension of a public officer will require the approval of the appropriate Service Commission.

32. The Police

The Chief of Police will be appointed by the Folice Service Commissioner after consultation with the chief minister and he will have security of tenure similar to that of a judge. The procedure for the removal of the Chief of Police will be initiated by the Police Service Commission.

- 33. The Constitution will place the police force under the command of the Chief of Police, and will provide that, in the exercise of his power to determine the use and to control the operations of the police force the Chief of Police will be under an obligation to comply with general directions of policy with respect to the maintenance of public safety and public order given him by the responsible Minister; in the exercise of his command of the force in other respects the Chief of Police will act on his own responsibility and will be independent. The organisation, maintenance and administration of the police force will be the responsibility of Ministers.
- 34. There will be a Police Service Commission which will consist of the Chairman of the Public Service Commission as Chairman and three other members who will be appointed by the Queen's representative in his personal discretion, after consulting the chief minister and the leader of the opposition. Members of the Commission, other than the Chairman, will hold office for a period of 3 years. They will be removable in the same manner and on the same grounds as the appointed member of the Judicial Service Commission. The procedure for the removal of a member of the Commission will be iniated by the Queen's representative in his personal discretion.
- 35. Subject to the arrangements specified above for the Chief of Police, the Police Service Commission will have powers of appointment, discipline and removal in respect of all police officers. The Commission will be authorised to delegate its powers of discipline and removal to the Chief of Police or any other officer of the police force, but any decision taken by an officer to whom powers are delegated to dismiss a police officer will require the confirmation of the Commission.

36. The Ombudsman

The Constitution will ostablish the office of Ombudsman. Appointments to this office will be made by the Queen's representative in his personal discretion after consulting the chief minister, the leader of the opposition and the other persons who appear to the Queen's representative to be leaders of parties in the Legislative Assembly. The Ombudsman will hold office for a period of four years and will be removable only on the grounds of inability or misbehaviour after a tribunal consisting of persons who are or have been judges have investigated any allegation against him and have recommended his removal; the procedure for removing the Ombudsman will be initiated by the Queen's representative in his personal discretion.

37. The Ombudsman will have jurisdiction to investigate complaints regarding the acts, omissions, decisions and recommendations of specified public bodies and other officers which affect the interests of individuals or bodies of persons. He will be entitled to act upon his own initiative or upon receiving a complaint from an individual or a body and matters may also be referred to him for consideration by ministers and membors of the Legislative Assembly. The bodies which the Ombudsman will be authorised to investigate will include Government Departments, thoir officers, tender boards, the police and prison and hospital authorities. Service Commissions will be excluded from investigation by the Ombudsman.

Ombudsman.

36. The investigation of the Ombudsman will be carried out in private and what occurs during the course of an investigation will be absolutely privileged. The Ombudsman will not be required to give anybody a hearing save where it appears to him that there are grounds for reporting adversely on the conduct of the department, organisation or person concerned. There will be powers to examine witnesses and also powers vested in the appropriate Government authority to prevent the disclosure of information on the grounds that it prejudices defence, external relations or internal security or that it might divulge the proceedings of the Council of Ministers. The Ombudsman will be entitled to refuse to investigate any complaint that is more than six month's old or on the ground that it is vexatious or too trivial or that the complainant has insufficient interest in the matter and he will be enabled to discontinue an investigation for any reason that seems fit to him. He will be precluded from investigating any matter in respect of which there is a statutory right of appeal to or review by a court or tribunal. However, he will not be precluded from investigating a matter merely because it will be open to the complainant to impugn the measure, act or decision in the metter as a violation of the constitutional guarantees of fundamental rights.

39. The Ombudsman will be entitled to report unfavourably on any decision, recommendation, act or omission on the ground that it is contrary to law, based wholly or partly on a mistake of law or fact, unreasonably delayed or otherwise manifestly unreasonable. He will address his report, recommending any remedial action that he thinks proper, to the department or organisation concerned. If no adequate remedial action has been taken within a reasonable time, he will be empowered to make a special report to the Legislative Assembly. The principle functions of the Ombudsman will be included in the Constitution, the supplementary provision being made in an ordinary law of Mauritius.

40. Financial procedure

The Constitution will provide for a procedure with respect to the appropriation and expenditure of public monies, which will ensure the control by the Legislature of Mauritius of public money. The Constitution will accordingly establish a Consolidated Fund into which (with certain exceptions) there will be paid all revenues of Mauritius and out of which (with certain exceptions) all expenditure will be met. Estimates of expenditure expected to be incurred in a financial year will be laid in the preceding financial year before the Legislature for its approval and will be included in an appropriation law to be passed by the Legislature. Except in the case of expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund and certain other cases, no money will be withdrawn from the Consolidated Fund except under the authority of an appropriation law. The Constitution will provide for the presentation of supplementary estimates and the enactment of supplementary appropriation laws, where this is necessary, and will also establish a Contingencies Fund out of which payment may be made to meet urgent and unforescen needs.

- 41. There will be a Director of Audit who will have the function of auditing all public accounts and reporting on them to the Legislature. The Director of Audit will be appointed by the Public Service Commission after consultation with the chief minist and the leader of the opposition and will have security of tenure similar to that of a judge.
- 42. The salary and conditions of service of the Queen's representative, judges of the Supreme Court, Members of the Service Commission, the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Chiof of Police, the Director of Audit, the Electoral Commissioner and the Ombudsman will be protected in the same manner as the salary and conditions of service of judges are protected under the existing Constitution.

43. The Prerogative of Mercy

The prerogative of mercy will be exercised by the Queen's representative on the advice of a special committee. The members of the committee will be appointed by the Queen's representative acting in his personal discretion. The Constitution will require that capital cases should be taken into account at a meeting of the special committee.

44. Alteration of the Constitution

The legislature of Mauritius will have power to alter the citution. The procedure will be as follows:constitution.

- (a) A Bill for an amendment to the provisions of the constitution (other than the entrenched provisions specified below) will require the support of not less than two-thirds of all the members of the Legislative Assembly to pass the Assembly.
- (b) A Bill for the amendment of the entrenched provisions of the constitution will require the support of not less than three quarters of all the members of the Legislative Assembly to pass the Assembly.

MAURITIUS No. 423

London, S.W.1.

6 October, 1965.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the discussions which I held in London recently with a group of Mauritius Ministers led by the Premier on the subject of UNVUS Defence Facilities in the Indian Ocean. I enclose a copy of the record prepared here of the final meeting on this matter with Mauritius Ministers - this record has already been agreed in London with Sir S. Ramgoolam, and by him with Mr. Mohamed, as being an accurate record of what was decided.

2. I should be grateful for your early confirmation that the Mauritius Government is willing to agree that Britain should now take the necessary legal steps to detach the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius on the conditions enumerated in (i) - (viii) in paragraph 22 of the enclosed record.

3. Points (i) and (ii) of praymrph 22 will be taken into account in the preparation of a first draft of the Defence Agreement which is to be negotiated between the British and Mauritius Governments before independence. The preparation of this draft will now be put in hand.

4. As regards point (iii), I am are nging for separate consultations to take place with the Mauritius Government with a view to working out agreed projects to which the £3 million compensation will be devoted. Your Ministers will recall that the possibility of land settlement schemes was touched on in our discussions.

5. As regards points (iv), (v) and (vi) the British Government will make appropriate representations to the American Government as soon as possible. You will be kept fully informed of the progress of these representations.

6. The Chagos Archipelago will remain under British sovereignty, and Her Majesty's Government have taken careful note of points (vii) and (viii).

I have the honour to be,
Sir
Your most obedient humble cervent,

(for Secretary of State)

SECRETARY OF STATE'S VISIT TO WASHINGTON 10 - 11 OCTOBER, 1965

24/183

Talking Points

We are grateful for the generous American contribution (a half-share of a total of up to £10m.) towards the cost to be incurred in detaching the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius. We are pressing on with further action as a matter of urgency.

- 2. A decision to cancel the U.S. requirement for a communication station on Diego Garcia, the only facility immediately planned, might lead to difficulties. We hope that if it should have to be cancelled some other immediate project can be substituted for it. We ourselves have no immediate plans to build on any of the islands, although various projects are being considered.
- 5. We count on United States support in the United Nations and elsewhere to defend this project against criticism with which we may be faced once it becomes public. We hope to keep it confidential for the moment, at least until the agreement of the Seychelles and Mauritius Governments has been formally confirmed.

Background Note

The Secretary of State will recall that at the end of the Mauritius Constitutional Conference last month Sir S. Ramgoolam and a majority of Mauritian Ministers present agreed in principle to the datachment of the Chagos Archipelago (including Diego Garcia) in exchange for £3m. compensation. It is expected that the formal agreement of the Mauritian Government will be secured shortly and that the Seychelles Executive Council will not raise serious difficulties over the detachment of Aldabra, Farqhuar and Desroches (and the settlement of other outstanding problems including the long outstanding question of the terms on which a U.S. tracking station in the Soychelles should operate) in exchange for a civil air field on Mahé (the main island of the Seychelles group) at an expected cost of about £3m. Additional compensation for :resettlement of the inhabitants of the islands chosen for defence facilities, for loss of coconut crops, etc., will also have to be paid in each case. 2. We were able to give this good news to a delegation of American officials led by Mr. Kitchen, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Politico-Military Affairs, at the end of discussions held in London on 23 and 24 September to consider the administrative, legal and financial details of the defence proposals. It was agreed at the end of these discussions that the Colonial Office would press on with securing the formal agreement of the Seychelles and Mauritius authorities and start work on the complicated administrative measures once this agreement had been obtained. Mr. Kitchen warned us during the discussions that they were about to embark on a review of their world-wide communications requirements including the proposal communications station on Diego Garcia in the Chagos Archipelago. The implication is that it

I enclose a copy of a formal Secret despatch we sent to the Governor of Mauritius on the 6th October covering the final agreed record of the Lancaster House meeting of September 23rd at which my Secretary of State secured the agreement of leading Mauritius Ministers to the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago.

2. The intervening time since that meeting was held has been spent in securing, on the Secretary of State's instructions, the agreement of Sir S. Ramgoolam and his colleagues to the record. In the event, this was not a very easy proceeding, and we have had to agree to the stipulations recorded in paragraph 22, some of which are perhaps rather tiresome - though by no means as much so as in the wording originally suggested by the Mauritians. As the despatch makes clear, the next move is for the Governor to secure formal confirmation of the Mauritius Government's willingness to agree to our taking the necessary legal action for detachment. This of course arises because the Governor originally broached the subject with the full Council of Ministers, and our talks in London were only with the main party leaders and an Independent Minister, Mr. Paturau, and, in the last and critical meeting, without the leader of the Parti Mauricien Mr. Koenig, who had walked out of the Conference earlier in the day and no doubt thought it tactically wise, from the point of view of future political campaigning in Mauritius, not to be involved in the final Mauritius agreement.

3. The Governor - and Sir S. Ramgoolam and the Ministers who support him - may not find it an easy task to secure the formal concurrence of the Council of Ministers which we require: but we are confident that, since the leading political parties representing almost 70% of the votes at the lest election are committed, and since in many ways the Parti Mauricien have hitherto made a point of the importance they attach to a continuing British presence in and around Mauritius, confirmation will be forthcoming. You, and the others to whom I am sending copies of this letter, will see what is said in the despatch about the various stipulations in paragraph 22 of the record. The main problems will arise over (iv), (v) and (vi), and we shall be considering how best to take these up with the Americans. I hasten to add that neither we nor Sir 3. Ramgoolam and his colleagues immediately concerned have any hope of extracting concessions from the Americans, e.g. over sugar imports. Our Ministers and officials, and the Economic Minister at the U.S. Embassy in direct conversations with the Mauritians, spent a lot of time explaining exactly why concessions on sugar are not practicable. My impression is that Sir S. Ramgoolam wanted to have stipulations of this kind in from the point of view of their effect on his colleagues back home in Mauritius. At all events we shall have to go through the motions with the Americans but not everybody will be very surprised if, on some issues, they achieve no results. On the other hand where (one would imagine) the Americans can help, e.g. perhaps over wheat and rice, and such matters as nevigational and meteorological information etc., it will be very much in the interests of us all if they contrive to do so with reasonable generosity. It might be a good idea to discuss these matters in the new Cabinet Office Committee some time.

4. I will of course keep you informed on developments in the Mauritius context. Meanwhile, we must be getting on with the Seychelles side about which I recently wrote.

5. I am sending copies of this letter to Nicholls, Treasury, Holton and Burlace, Ministry of Defence, Harris Ministry of Overseas Development and Champion of Commonwealth Relations Office.

Prime Minister

DEPENCE FACILITIES IN THE INDIAN OCEAN

At their 21st Meeting on 12 April the D.O.P. Committee invited me to initiate discussions with the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments about the proposals for U.S./U.K. Defence Facilities in the Indian Ocean set out in OPD(65)68. The Mauritius Government raised various difficulties which were reported to the Committee; but at the end of the Mauritius Constitutional Conference in September agreement was reached with the Premier, Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, and a majority of Ministers present, on terms which the Committee approved at their 41st meeting on 23rd September. 2. The proposals are briefly as follows. The islands of the Chagos Archipelago, a dependency of Mauritius, and the islands of Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches, part of the Seychelles group, are to be put under direct British administration and made available for U.S. and U.K. defence facilities. Compensation consisting of Ejm is to be paid to the Mauritius Government and a civil airfield which is expected to cost about the same ascunt, constructed in the Seychelles. A further sum is to be paid for compensation and resettlement to the commercial and private interests concerned. H.M.G. and the U.S. Government will each be responsible for the construction of facilities they require, with provision for joint use. The United States Government have agreed to share half the compensation costs up to £10 m. This fact is to be kept secret for Congressional reasons and in order to restrain the local governments from trying to put up the price. A U.S./U.K. agreement covering the use of the facilities is under discussion between officials.

- 5. The Seychelles Executive Council have now formally agreed to accept the arrangements proposed in exchange for the compensation offered, Hauritius Ministers have also given their formal approval, subject to official confirmation that we agree to the following points:-
 - (a) if the need for the facilities on the Chagos Archipelago disappears, the islands will be returned to Mauritius, and
 - (b) the benefit of any minerals or oil discovered in or near the Chagos Archipelago should revert to the Mauritius Government.

The Mauritius Government had previously been told that the Archipelago will remain under British sovereignty and the British Government have taken careful note of these points. I propose to reply to their latest request that it is being further considered but that it has been necessary for the Order in Council to be made.

4. The Governor of Mauritius has also reported that Mr. Moenig and his Parti Maurician collesgues, who were not opposed in principle to the proposals but considered that the compensation arrangements are inadequate, are now considering their position in the Governaent. The Governor says that if Parti Maurician Ministers resign, it will be for local political reasons. Meanwhile they understand that no disclosure may be made of the defence discussions and they have undertaken to consult the Governor before resigning and not to make any public statements before the 12th November.

5. As the Mauritius Council of Ministers has confirmed its agreement to the proposals, it is essential that the aprangements for detachment of these islands should be completed as soon as possible.

6. From the United Estions point of view the timing is particularly awkward. We are already under attack over aden not knodesia, and whilst it is possible that the arrangements for detachment will be ignored when they become public, it seems more likely that they will be added to the list of 'imperislist' measures for which we are attacked. We shall be accused of creating a new colony in a period of decolonisation and of establishing new military bases when we should be getting out of the old ones. If there were any chance of avoiding publicity until this session of the General Assembly adjourns at Christmas there would be advantage in delaying the Order in Council until then. But to do so would jeopardize the whole plan.

- 7. The Fourth Committee of the United Nations has now reached the item on Miscellaneous Territories and may well discuss Mauritius and Seychelles next week. If they raise the question of defence arrangements on the Indian Ocean Islands before we have detached them, the Mauritius Government will be under considerable pressure to withdraw their agreement to our proposals. Moreover we should lay ourselves open to an additional charge of dishonesty if we evaded the defence issue in the Fourth Committee and then made the Order in Council immediately afterwards. It is therefore important that we should be able to present the U.N. with a fait accompli. 8. In these circumstances I propose to arrange for an Order in Council to be made on Monday 8th November. A prepared written Parliamentary Question will be tabled on 9th November and answered on 10th November in the terms of the attached draft. Supplementary background guidance has been prepared for use with the press.
- 9. If we can meet the timetable set out in the previous peragraph we shall have a good chance of completing the operation before discussion in the Fourth Committee reaches the Indian Ocean Islands. We shall then be better placed to meet the criticism which is inevitable at whatever time we detach these islands from Mauritius and Seychelles.

QUESTION

To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any further approaches have been made to the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments about the use of islands in the Indian Ocean for British and American defence facilities.

ANSWER

Yes. With the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles new arrangements for the administration of certain islands in the Indian Ocean were introduced by Order in Council made on the 8th November. The islands are the Chagos Archipelago, some 1,200 miles north-east of Mauritius, and Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches in the Western Indian Ocean. Their populations are approximately 1000, 100, 172 and 112 respectively. The Chagos Archipelago was formerly administered by the Government of Mauritius and the other three islands by that of Sechelles. The islands will be called the British Indian Ocean Territory and will be administered by a Commissioner. It is intended that the islands will be available for the construction of defence facilities by the British and United States Governments, but no firm plans have yet been made by either government. Compensation will be paid as appropriate.

Your Secret Despatch No. 423 of 6th October. United Kingdom/U.S. Defence Interests.

Council of Ministers today confirmed agreement to the detachment of Chagos Archipelago on conditions enumerated, on the understanding that

- (1) statement in paragraph 6 of your despatch "H.M.G. have taken careful note of points (vii) and (viii)" means H.M.G. have in fact agreed to them.
- (2) As regards (vii) undertaking to Legislative Assembly excludes
 - (a) sale or transfer by H.M.G. to third party or
 (b) any payment or financial obligation by Mauritius as condition of return.
- (5) In (viii) "on or near" means within area within which Mauritius would be able to derive benefit but for change of sovereignty. I should be grateful if you would confirm this understanding is agreed.

2. PMSD Ministers dissented and (are now) considering their position in the government. They understand that no disclosure of the matter may be made at this stage and they also understand that if they feel obliged to withdraw from the government they must let me have (resignations) in writing and consult with me about timing of the publication (which they accepted should not be before Friday 12th November).

3. (Within this) Ministers said they were not opposed in principle to the establishment of facilities and detachment of Chagos but considered compensation inadequate, especially the absence of additional (sugar) quota and negotiations should have been pursued and pressed more strongly. They were also dissatisfied with mere assurances about (v) and (vi). They also reised points (i), (2) and (3) in paragraph 1 above.

Addressed to UKMis New York telegram No. 4310 of 6 November. Repeated for information to: Washington.

Your telegram No. 2697 [of 28 October]: Indian Ocean Islands.

Seychelles Executive Council have unanimously agreed to detachment proposals. Mauritius Ministers accepted proposals on 5 November subject to certain understandings, which will be taken up with them separately, on the reversion of the Chagos islands, if and when these are no longer needed, and on any future benefits from minerals. minerals.

2. In-view of possible-publicity and consequent pressure on the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments to change their minds, we are proceeding with detachment immediately. We are arranging for an Order in Council to be made on 8 November and for a prepared Parliamentary Question to be tabled on 9 November for written answer on 10 November. Text of this, together with additional guidance will be telegraphed to you as soon as possible.

3. If this operation is complete before Mauritius comes up in the Fourth Committee It seems to us that you will then be better placed to deal with the inevitable criticism. We hope therefore that you will do your best to ensure that discussion of Mauritius and other territories in the Indian Ocean is put off for as long as possible, and at least until 11 November.

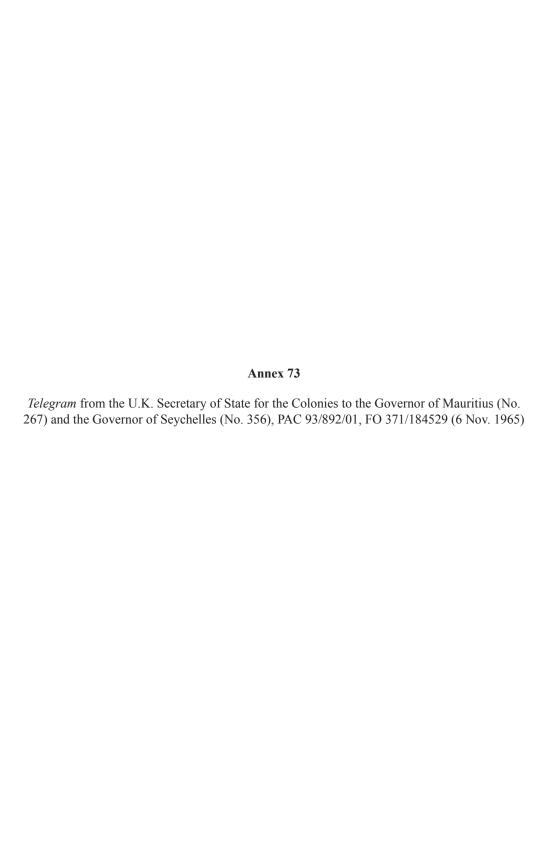

as possible, and at least until II November.

1. On the assumption that the timetable in paragraph 2 above is met, we should be grateful for your urgent advice/on whether you should volunter a statement in the Fourth Committee when Mauritius and Seychelles come up for discussion, or whether it would be better to wait until the question of defence facilities is raised by other members of the Committee. You will remember that this is likely since we informed Commonwealth and other interested Governments some time ago that we intended to seek the consent of Mauritius and Seychelles to the detachment of these islands.

5. You should concert tactics with the United States Delegation, on whose support we rely in this matter. We are informing the United States Embassy and asking them to clear our guidance with Washington.

Legal proceedings, particularly criminal proceedings, arising after date of Order will cause problems and it will be necessary for Commissioner to establish courts to deal with any new cases, and to provide legal sanction for the detention of prisoners, and for the execution of sentences. Early action will also be needed for the review of Mauritius law in its application to Chagos Archipelago so that Seychelles law can be substituted where practicable. If it is necessary for persons convicted of offences in the new territory to serve sentences in Seychelles, presumably it will be necessary for the Seychelles to enact legislation for the execution of those sentences.

- 5. At a later stage there will be a number of administrative matters requiring attention (e.g. continuance of provision for education in Chagos Archipelago at present provided for Mauritius). In the meantime we hope that both you and Governor of Mauritius will provide for existing arrangements to continue subject to any necessary financial adjustments being made in due course.
- 6. In addition to the Order in Council Royal Instructions and a Commission will be issued on 10th November. Before assuming duties, Order requires you to take oath of allegiance and the following oath "I do swear that I will well and truly serve Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, Her Heirs and Successors in the office of Commissioner of British Indian Ocean Territory".

telegram No.4310 [of 6 November : Indian Ocean],

Begins:

Q. To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any further approaches have been made to the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments about the use of islands in the Indian Ocean for British and American defence facilities.

A. Yes. With the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles new arrangements for the administration of certain islands in the Indian Ocean were introduced by Order in Council made on the Stim November. The islands are the Chagos Archipelago, some 1,200 miles north-east of Mauritius, and Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches in the Western Indian Ocean. Their populations are approximately 1,000, 100, 100, 172 and 112 respectively. The Chagos Archipelago was formerly administered by the Government of Mauritius and the other three islands by that of Sevencheles. The islands will be called the British Indian Ocean Perritory and will be administered by a Commissioner. It is intended that the islands will be related by a Commissioner. The islands will be administered by a Commissioner. The islands while to stands will be paid a wallable for the construction of defence facilities by the British and United States Governments, but no firm plans have yet been made by either Government. Compensation will be paid as appropriate. as appropriate.

Ends.

Following is guidance (cleared with Americans) for use in answer to questions from the Press after the P.Q. has been answered.

/Begins: SECRET

- (a) Consultation with other Governments. In addition to securing the approval of the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments, Commonwealth and other interested Governments have been informed of these plans at an earlier stage.
- (b) Compensation. Appropriate compensation will be paid to commercial and private interests, as well as to the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles.
- (c) Facilities in View. Although no firm plans have yet been made either by Her Majesty's Government or by the United States Government for the construction of facilities, possibilities currently being considered are a United States. communications station and supporting facilities and a Royal Navy refuelling deport, both on the island of Diego Garcia in the Chagos Archivelago:

 (d) Effect on Bases in Singapore and Aden. None. The only British facility envisaged, a naval refuelling station, is of a quite different order to those in Singapore and Aden.

 - (e) First Step towards Leaving Singapore and Aden. No connexion whatever. These facilities will be useful in themselves. Any decisions about redeployment of British forces must await the outcome of the Defence Review which is not yet complete.
 - (f) Anticipation of the Defence Review Decisions. No. Construction of any new manifelyings at English expense will of course be subject to the decision of the Defence Review.
 - (g) Number of Islands concerned. Islands other than Diego Garcia have been included in view of possible requirements in the long term.
 - (h) Choice of Islands. The Islands chosen have virtually no permanent inhabitants and are well placed for communications in the Indian Ocean area.

/(1):Compensation

- (j) Cost sharing. In principle each Government will pay for the facilities they require.
- Joint use. There will be provision for joint use.

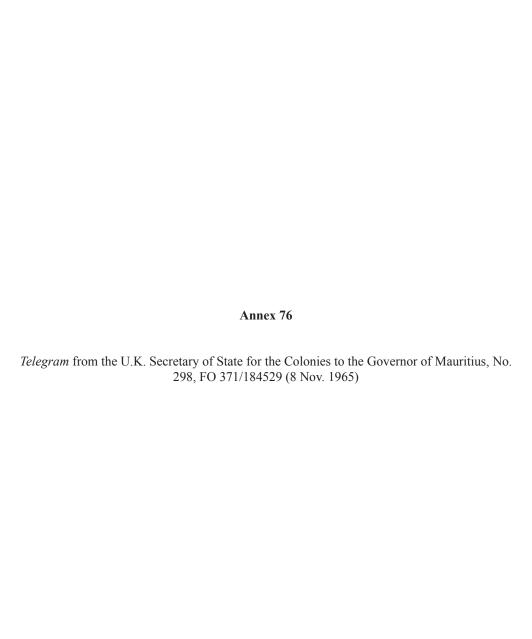

(1) Compensation Costs. Compensation costs are the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government.

(m) Timing. These arrangements have been under examination for some time. Initial surveys were carried out in the summer of 1964, as was made public at the time.

(n) Other Islands. We have no plans for making similar arrangements elsewhere.

(o) Use as Staging-Posts for Ships be possible. We have no firm plans.

OUTWARD TELEGRAM

FROM THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES

TO MAURITIUS (Sir J. Rennie)

Cypher

Sent 8th November, 1965

PAC. 93/892/01

15.47 hrs.

Your telegram No. 247. U.K./U.S. Defence Interests.

I am glad Council of Ministers have confirmed agreement to detachment of Chagos Archipelago.

- 2. As already stated in paragraph 6 of my despatch No. 423, the Chagos Archipelago will remain under British sovereignty. The islands are required for defence facilities and there is no intention of permitting prospecting for minerals or cils on or near them. The points set out in your paragraph 1 should not therefore arise but I shall nevertheless give them further consideration in view of your request.
- yiew of your request.

 3. I note PMSD Ministers are not opposed in principle to detachment but consider compensation inadequate. For islands some 1,200 miles from Mauritius from which the Mauritius Government has never derived much if any revenue, the payment of 25 million as development aid to Mauritius in addition to direct compensation to landowners and to easts of resettling others cannot, I consider, be regarded as inadequate. With regard to the other points mentioned in your paragraph 3, the U.S. Government has been warned that they will be alsed with them and as you are aware some discussions have already been held with officials in London. No firm plans have yet been made for the construction of any defence facilities on these islands and these are matters which can only be decided in detail when such plans are drawn up.
- 4. I trust that PMSD Ministers will agree that in all the circumstances the present proposals are in the long term interest of Mauritius and that on reconsideration they will feel able to support them. I am disturbed to see from press reports today that despite the undertaking referred to in your paragraph 2 that no disclosures would be made at this stage, PMSD Ministers have given publicity to these proposals.
- 5. A meeting of the Privy Council was held this morning, 8th November, and an Order in Council entitled the British Indian Ocean Territory Order 1965 (S.I. 1965 No. (to follow)), has been made constituting the "British Indian Ocean Territory consisting of the Chagos Archipelago and Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches islands. Copies will be sent to you as soon as prints are available. Because Parliament was prorogued today I cannot inform it until Wednesday, 10th November of the making of this Order. I

Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 2837 of

8 November,
Repeated for information Saving to: Washington

For consideration Tuesday morning.

Your telegrams numbers 4327 and 4330: Indian Ocean Islands.

This was not raised when debate on miscellaneous territories opened to-day and Soviet references to bases were in general terms. Speakers tomorrow may pick up Press reports mentioned in your second telegram under reference and once London announcement is out matter seems almost certain to be raised.

- to be raised.

 2. References in text of announcement to creation of the British Indian Ocean Territory may focus attention on points in Jerrom's letter IRD 120/52/01 of 28 July to Brown. The statement in paragraph 2(h) of first telegram under reference that there are "virtually" no permanent inhabitants may well lead to charges of failure to carry out our Charter ohligations to those who are permanent inhabitants. Moreover, our counter-arguments will have to avoid giving ammunition to Argentina which is sure to perceive analogy with Falklands (i.e. we cannot argue that Indian Ocean Territory is not a non-self governing territory in sense of Chapter xi of Charter merely because there were no indigenous inhabitants originally or because only a few of present inhabitants are permanent).
- 3. In the circumstances best course if you agree might be to say, if we are pressed on this point, that all questions relating to future status of the Islands, applicability or otherwise of Chapter XI, administration, etc. are under consideration and decisions have not yet been taken. This may provoke pressure and even a resolution calling on us to accept Charter obligations for the new territory but so might a declaration that we shall not accept such obligations.
- 4. If we could say there are (repeat are) no permanent inhabitants many of these difficulties would not arise, but use of "virtually" (see paragraph 2 above) seems to preclude this.
- 5. In any case any available extra information about numbers of "permanent" inhabitants on each island and their origins would be most useful.

/6. We assume

- 6. We assume you do not wish us to say anything about "resettlement" even if this is raised in the Committee, except to refer to paragraph 5(c) of C.R.O. telegram No. W/Circular 61 Saving of 6 July about seeing that the interests of the few local inhabitants are protected.
- 100al inhabitants are protected.

 7. An alternative line may be against the alleged breach of paragraph 6 of resolution 1514(xv) involved in detachment (and this may somewhat direct attention from status of the new territory). This is likely to attract wide support. We would reply that Islands were administered under Mauritius and Seychelles only for convenience and that paragraph 6 is therefor irrelevant.

IMMEDIATE SECRET BUILD

Addressed to UKNIS New York telegram No. 4361 of 10 November Repeated for information to:- Washington [Immediate]

Your telegram No. 2837 [of 8 November].

Indian Ocean Islands.

We recognize that we are in a difficult position as regards references to people at present on the detached Islands since we want to avoid the territory being classes as non-self-governing within the terms of Chapter XI and also do not wish to give an argument to the Argentine over the Falkland Islands and also to some extent to Spain over Gibraltar.

- 2. Figures of total population are given in Parliamentary Answer (My telegram No. 1327) They can all be classified as Mauritians or Seychellois but we know that a few were born on Diego Garcia and perhaps some of the other Islands and so were their parents before them. We cannot therefore assert that there are no permanent inhabitants however much this would have been to our advantage.
- 3. In these circumstances we think it would be best to avoid all references to "permanent inhabitants". We are accordingly arranging that in place of the guidance in paragraph 2(h) of our telegram No. $\delta 27$ on population the following will be used in answer to questions by the Press in London:-

Begins.

"The total population in all the Islands numbers only about 1,500 persons who, apart from a few officials and estate managers, consist of labourers from Mauritius and Seyohelles employed on copra estates, guano extraction, and the turtle industry together with their dependants."

Ends.

/4. If questioned

- 1. If questioned on this subject you should reply accordingly. You can add that we have of course their welfare very much in mind and shall be discussing with the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles the arrangements that can most suitably be made for them. As stated in the Parliamentary Answer the territory will be administered by a Commissioner and you could say that the detailed arrangements have yet to be made. You could if you think that this would be useful indicate that in presenting reports next year for 1965 on Mauritius and Seychelles we will include a statement of what these arrangements are.
- 5. You should know that present thinking is that inhabitants would not be removed from all the Islands until they are required for defence purposes but timing will depend on resettlement plans which have yet to be worked out. This may make it difficult to avoid an obligation to report on the territory under Article 73(e). We are most enxious however not to have to do this and are considering the matter further. In the meantime we should wish to avoid any comment on the applicability of Chapter XI. If this is raised in a way which requires some answer you should say that it would be premature to deal with the question until detailed arrangements for the administration of the territory have been worked out. If a resolution is tabled calling on us to accept Charter obligations for the territory you should seek instructions but we hope this can be avoided.
- 6. Your paragraph 6. We agree; see also paragraph 4 above.
- 7. Your paragraph 7. We agree. You could also say that the two Governments have been fully consulted about and are in agreement with the new arrangements.

Fourth Committee - British Indian Ocean Perritory.

This was raised in todays debate by Tanzania, Cuba, Yugoslavia and in passing by Indian. Speakers quoted Press reports of the United Kingdom announcement of 10 November and concentrated on

- (a) oreation of a new 'colony';
- (b) inadmissibility of detaching land from a colonial Government regardless of compensation ('hash money') paid;
- (c) damage to interests of a minority even if representatives of the majority had been persuaded to agree; and
- (d) violation of Resolution 1514 (xv).
- 2. In his general winding up statement at conclusion of today's meetings Brown included a short passage in reply to these points immediately after describing outcome of Mauritius Conference.

Despatch from F. D. W. Brown of the U.K. Mission to the U.N. to C. G. Eastwood of the Colonial Office, No. 15119/3/66 (2 Feb. 1966)

2 February, 1966.

Thank you for your letter IRD/140/458/01 of 7 January about the Indian Ocean Territory and Article 73 of the Charter.

2. On future action by the Committee of 24 (your paragraph 1) we must certainly expect that the Committee will want a discussion on the issue. We do not know when it will come nor in what form and much will depend on the rest of the Committee's programme and on any further petitions. Although there is no sign at present of this becoming a really major issue at any rate compared with such questions as Rhodesia and Aden, there is every possibility as Lord Caradon told your Secretary of State at the meeting on 20 January, that we shall be faced with serious trouble, and much will depend on how we can present the matter.

3. It is worth noting what has happened in the Fourth Committee so far. Both the Committee discussions and Assembly resolution 2066(XX) dealt with the matter as part of the question of Mauritius. Officially no cognizence was taken of the existence of B.I.O.T. as a separate entity and indeed the resolution simply noted with deep concern that any step to detach the islands "would be" a contravention of resolution 1514 and invited us to take no action which "would" dismember the territory and violate its territorial integrity. Many delegations may not have tumbled to the fait accompli of separation. The question of adding B.I.O.T. to the list of non self-governing territories may not therefore arise immediately so directly as you suggest, and the point at issue may come up initially under either Mauritius or the Seychelles as it has in the fast.

4. Secondly the point of attack, or rather warning, has so far been restricted, apart from the general "bases" issue, to the point concerning the territorial integrity of Mauritius and the Seychelles in the context of resolution 1514 and is not yet on the more serious charge of violating Chapter XI of the Charter itself, although this would come and be much more serious if it became apparent that we were doing so. Eventually we shall have to face the issue of whether we regard Chapter XI as applicable, if only when the Committee of 24 comes to report on the transmission of information under article 73(e) for 1965. If we have not transmitted any information, this will be almost certain to attract comment and we shall be obliged to justify our position. This brings me directly to the point in paragraph 3 of your letter that the new territory should not be considered as a non-self-governing territory.

5. It is extremely difficult to comment on this point on the basis of the information available - especially that in Jerrom's letter IRD 140/52/01 of 28 July last year, F.O. telegram No. 4361 to which you refer, and your letter under reply - and in particular in the absence of any firm plans about the future of the present inhabitants, the timetable for establishing the defence facilities, and the extent to which some inhabitants may remain after each island has been "militarized". It seems clear however that to begin with a considerable number, and even at the end some, of the present inhabitants will remain, end this of course causes the main difficulty from the point of view of presenting our case here.

6. On the basis of the information available it seems to us difficult to avoid the conclusion that the new territory is a non-self-governing territory under Chapter XI of the Charter, particularly since it has and will or may have a more or less settled population, however small. We cannot disclaim Charter obligations to the inhabitants because they are not indigenous; since this would destroy our case on the Falklands and Gibralter; nor apparently would the facts substantiate a plea that the inhabitants are not permanent - even if (which is not necessarily the case) Chapter XI of the Charter were confined to permanent populations. Therefore we here feel that, however we may present the issue, the United Nations will consider that it does fall under Chapter XI; it is not in their view so much a question of our deciding whether or not to accept a Charter obligation as of our actually having one whether we like it or not. Openly to refuse to accept our obligations would of course also be in contradiction of the colonial policy which we have not only followed of our own free will, but announced time and time again here, that we proceed by consultation and consent on the basis of the paramountcy of the interests of the people concerned and in accordance with the principle of self-determination. Moreover if I understand it right we have in fact gone as far as we possibly can to safeguard the interests of the people and intend to continue to do so: given that defence facilities were required, we have looked for as unpopulated a set of atolls as we could find, consistent with military requirements, so that the minimum hardship would be caused; in order not to complicate the decolonisation of Mauritius and later the Seychelles, we have created the new territory; and we are now going to pay large compensation to Mauritius and the Seychelles and do the best we can for the inhabitants. We therefore wonder whether, in the light of the 7. It may therefore be worth looking again at what would have to be done if we were to accept and try to discharge our Charter obligations. In theory we should have to accept the paramountcy of the interests of the people, develop selfgovernment and free political institutions, and take into account their political aspirations; we should have to act in a manner which could be reconciled with the principle of self-determination (in view not of Chapter XI but rather of our own repeated and unqualified commitments to do so in all our territories); and we should also have to report on the territory. In practice this might not accessarily amount to more than devising some means of associating the present population pending their evacuation, and the final remaining labour force after militarization, with the administration of the islands. We would also have to devise evacuation schemes, as and when the time comes for each individual island, with suitable individual financial inducements to ensure that those who are to stay can be shwon to have done so voluntarily. Would not these measures to some extent at least be necessary for the orderly administration of the islands and of the evacuation, quite apart from our Charter obligations, even though they would/be difficult? As regards reporting we shall be faced anyhow with having to explain in the Committee of 24 and the Fourth Committee what we are doing in order to answer petitioners and criticisms. Would reporting under Article 73(e) necessarily inflict any further burden or have any wider longterm implication which we could not accept?

- 8. We fully realise that this course may be either impossible to carry out because of the geographical separation of the islands, or be incompatible with Anglo/American military requirements, and that the acceptance of Article 73 obligations may eventually land us in trouble, and that therefore the conclusion reached in your paragraph 3 may still turn out to be the only one practicable. You may however think in view of the arguments above that it is worth looking at again. It would incidentally to some extent mitigate the difficulty of our attitude in these islands conflicting with our position over the Falkland Islands and Gibraltar a conflict to which attention has already been drawn in the Fourth Committee.
- 9. Should this not be possible we entirely agree that it is worth considering what measures might be taken to reduce our vulnerability to criticism. The measures foreshadowed in your paragraph 5(1) and (2) would certainly help us to some extent, by enabling us to show that there was no local ownership of land and that all the inhabitants of the islands were legally either Mauritians or Seychellois. But to give this substance we should have to demonstrate that all these people had the full political and other rights of other Mauritians and Seychellois including, most important, the right to vote and to be represented in their parent legislatures, and to enjoy Mauritius or Seychelles citizenship - in fulfilment (until independence) of our Charter obligations in respect of those two territories. If some special arrangement could be made to enable those on the islands to exercise their votes (by post or proxy) at elections in Mauritius and the Seychelles, this would make the point more obvicusly valid. Again, if there are any of the inhabitants who are not accepted by Mauritius or the Seychelles as "belongers", would it be possible to consider making them full United Kingdom citizens with voting rights in the United Kingdom? In this way, we could properly claim that although we could not accept any obligations in respect of the Indian Ocean Territory as a territory, we fully accepted our obligations, including Chapter XI obligations, to the people living in the Territory and were actively discharging those obligations. Then - a point already brought out above - it would be highly desirable to avoid any action relating to the evacuation of these people, as and when this becomes necessary, which might smack of compulsion. Our position would be much better here if we could show that the people conderned had voluntarily accepted evacuation and that this was because their interests had been properly looked after in the process. the process.

10. I should add that we are also inclined to think that the measures in your paragraph 5(1) and (2) would be worth taking even if you were able to decide that we should accept our Charter obligations as suggested earlier in this letter. They might help us to justify the eventual evacuation measures and possibly also to dodge demands under Resolution 1514 for progress towards independence. In that case the provisions made for the inhabitants to have some say in the administration of the islands would be a bonus, over and above their rights as Mauritians or Seychellois.

11. Finally the reaction here. Whatever we do we are liable to be faced with serious trouble and, whether we try to show that our actions are consistent with our Charter obligations under Article 73 or not, there will always be those who will accuse us of being in breach of them. Indeed it would not be difficult for our critics to develop the arguable thesis that detachment by itself was a breach of Article 73. Nevertheless we are inclined to think that if we were to accept our Charter obligations in respect of the new territory, or at least not say we were not doing so, the effect of the reaction would probably be mitigated, and that conversely, if we deliberately say we will not do so, it will be increased. In either event what seems to us important from our angle here is that we should have as good a case as we can to explain and that in that explanation it should be clear that we are doing our best for the, admittedly very few, inhabitants concerned.

12. I am sorry that this is a bleak reply. Whatever you decide we shall of course do our best to defend it here and, such are the vagaries of the people with whom we are dealing, we cannot be certain that our predictions are right.

I BACKGROUND

The British Indian Ocean Territory was constituted by Order in Council in November, 1965 "for the construction of defence facilities by the British and United States Governments". The islands which form part of the British Indian Ocean Territory had formerly been administered as dependencies of Mauritius and the Sevohelles. £2m. compensation was agreed and has already been paid to the Government of Mauritius; in the case of the Sevohelles it was agreed that a civil airfield would be constructed in compensation to the Government of that territory. There was opposition at the time in Mauritius from the Parti Nauricien on the grounds that the compensation was insufficient; it has been dormant in the last few months but could reappear as an issue in the forthcoming Mauritius elections. In the Seychelles, the leader of the Seychelles People's United Perty, Mr. Rene, vociferously opposed the idea of American bases before agreement was reached with the Seychelles Government, but since then he has tried to steal credit for securing an airfield for the Seychelles and is

Geography, Present Population and Economic Activity

2. The new Territory consists of the Chagos Archipelago (formerly administered by the Government of Mauritius) and the groups of islands known as Aldabra, Farcuhar and Desroches (formerly administered by the Government of Seychelles). Their populations have been estimated to be approximately 1,000 (of which about a half are found in the one island of Diego Garcia), 100, 172 and 112 respectively. (This /population

The Chagos Archipelago is situated some 1,200 miles north-east of Archipelago is situated some 1,200 miles north-east of Mauritius and in fact nearer to the Seychelles. Desroches is 120 miles south-west of the Seychelles. Farquhar #120 south-west and Aldahra is 500 miles south-west. (A convenient sketch map of United States origin, not necessarily to scale, is attached at Anmen A.) Their previous administrative groupings are therefore largely previous administrative groupings are therefore largely an historical accident. When these is lands were an historical accident. When these is lands were criginally acquired by the Crown they were unpopulated but since the 19th century they have been developed privately as corra plantations on a small scale (except Aldahra, whose only economic asset is its turtle exports to the Seychelles).

The present population of these islands is, we believe, entirely, or almost entirely, of contract labour, or their entirely, or almost entirely, of contract labour, or their dependants, from Mauritius or the Seychelles employed by the present owners of the lend and living in housing the present owners of the lend and living in housing these islands other than in their jobs which they enter or these islands other than in their jobs which they enter or these islands other than to receive the present of them ere relatively short-term inhabitants, slemst all of them ere relatively short-term inhabitants, staying for longer or shorter periods (depending on whether they renew their contracts) but a former Colonial Secretary of Mauritius, Mr. Robert Newton, who conducted a survey of the islands in 1960 before their detachment estimated that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a shall number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island viz Diego Garcia that there was a small number in one island vi

Administration

4. The islands were hitherto very loosely administered from Mauritius and the Seychelles and were infrequently from Mauritius and the Seychelles and were infrequently fusited by the administrations of those two territories. Under the B.I.O.T. Order in Council 1965 the Earl of Oxford and Asquith, at present also Governor of the Seychelles is constituted the Commissioner of the B.I.O.T. and it is intended that a Resident Administrator will be appointed this year. Day-to-day administration of these islands has been in the past largely in the hands of the employers.

Future Use of B.I.O.T. and the Fate of its Inhabitants

5. No decisions have yet been reached by either Her Majesty's Government or the United States Government about the construction of any facilities anywhere in B.I.O.T. Neverconstruction of the B.I.O.T. In the B.B.O.T. is also surveying for a military airfield. The B.B.O.T. is also surveying faldabra as a possible site for a radio relay station for the purpose of broadcasting to East Africa. For purely /practical SECRET AND GUARD practical reasons the B.B.C. and the defence survey parties will join forces. At one time the United States Government were interested in having a communications station on Diego Gercia. This requirement has now faded but they have recently expressed interest in possible navel facilities on a modest scale for which they wish to carry out a survey of Diego Gercia in late September or October, Preferably with British participation. 10 2015 private 4 to 10 (40) 11 holy 12 holy 1

- October, preferably with British participation.

 6. There is therefore no immediate need to resettle the population of these islands but their evacuation might conceivably become necessary at six months notice should a military requirement of any of them arise. At present plans for the acquisition of the freehold rights in all these islands except Aldara, which is occupied by a lesse of the Crown, are being considered and a Ministry of Defence representative has recently returned from a visit to these islands where he has investigated possible purchase prices with the owners. Draft legislation at present under consideration includes an immigration law, which would require that the inhabitants should be issued with entry permits and a land ordinance which would provide the Government with powers of compulsory acquisition should negotiations break down.
- 7. The present owners are apparently aware of the Committee of 24 interest in B.I.O.T. and according to the Ministry of Defence have pitched their prices in accordance with the political embarrassment which might ensue should negotiations break down. It is as yet to early to judge whether a voluntary settlement will be reached but there is no reason to believe that an accommodation will not be achieved.
- 8. The evacuation of the islands should not (so far as can be judged in the absence at present of a settled administration) cause insuperable difficulty. The Chagos Archipelago, in which there is the greatest concentration of people, are wholly owned by the Chagos (galega Company, who also own the freehold in Agalega (which remains a dependency of Mauritius) where there are plans for expansion in copra production and where conceivably some resettlement might take place. From where conceivably some resettlement might take place. From all accounts, none of the population would have a real interest in staying in the islands unless employers were to find them jobs there. In this sense there is no real community and the great majority should be happy with settled occupations elsewhere. The cost of their resettlement, which would need to be planned with the full cooperation of the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments would be met by Her Majesty's Government.
- 9. Although the separation of these islands was fully agreed with the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments no progress has so far been made in discussing the resettlement of the population in detail; nor is it really possible to make very definite plans until the appointment of an Administrator, probably this year, who could undertake the work of establishing the origin of the individuals concerned on the spot and of examining their claims. We would wish to establish that the inhabitants are all legally either Mauritians or Seychellois and one of the matters which will have to be raised with the Mauritian and Seychelles Governments is the question of their acceptance that the individuals in question have this status and their agreement to the issue to the inhabitants of passports of their country of origin. We would then envisage the issue of temporary residence permits by B.I.O.T. for those in the Territory. We should then have established a situation in which there were no individuals with claims on B.I.O.T. or without claims on either Mauritius or the Seychelles. We envisage no difficulty with the Covernments of Mauritius and the Seychelles in carrying through these processes.

II OBJECTIVES

10. The primary objective in acquiring these islands from Mauritius and the Seychelles to form the new "British Indian Ocean Territory" was to ensure that Her Hajesty's Government had full title to, and control over, these islands so that they could be used for the construction of defence facilities without hindrance or political agitation and so that when a particular island would be needed for the construction of British or United States defence facilities Britain or the United States should be able to clear it of its current population. The Americans in particular stached great importance to this freedom of manocurve, divorced from the normal considerations applying to a populated dependent territory. These islands were therefore chosen not only for all practical purposes, no perment population.

- 11. It was implied in this objective, and recognised at the time, that we could not accept the principles governing our otherwise universal behaviour in our dependent territories, e.g. we could not accept that the interests of the inhabitants were peremount and that we should develop self-government there. We therefore consider that the best way in which we can satisfy these objectives, when our action comes under scrutiny in the United Nations, would be to assert from the start, if the need erose, that this territory did not fall within the scope of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter.
- 12. An important consideration here is that one of the prerequisites of United States cooperation, financially or otherwise, is that they too should have freedom of manoeuvre and it is extremely doubtful whether they would be interested in remaining purchers with us in developing facilities on these islands (no Agreement has yet been signed) if we had to regard the needs of the present trensient population as paramount or if there were a legal basis for continuous scrutiny of our actions in the United Nations.

III TACTICS

13. So far, the United Nations has dealt with the subject of B.I.O.T. almost entirely in the context of Mauritius. In last year's Fourth Committee and General assembly no cognisance was taken of the existence of B.I.O.T. as a separate entity and many delerations may not then have tumbled to the fait accompli of separation. General Assembly Resolution 2066(XX) dealt with B.I.O.T. on passent in the general context of Mauritius by simply noting with deep concern that any step to detech the islands "would be" a contravention of paragraph 6 of Resolution 1514(XV) and invited us to take no action which "would" dismember the territory and violate its territorial integrity. This year, however, there has already been separate mention of B.I.O.T. in the Secretariat Working Papers A/AC 108/L279 of 26 April 1966 and Add. 1 of 10 August, 1966 and the Russian representative in Sub-Committee I of the Committee of 24 has reised the subject of B.I.O.T. as a "bases" question.

has raised the subject of B.I.O.T. as a "bases" question.

14. The subject is bound to be raised again in the Committee of 24 shortly, possibly only in discussion of Mauritius or the Seychelles, or possibly in an attack on our use of the islands for strategic purposes. It is probable that a hostile resolution will be darfied. The resolution may simply deplore the fact of detachment but it may also claim that it is in contravention of the United Nations Charter and/or General Assembly Resolutions and may propose the establishment of some machinery (possibly a subcommittee or a visiting mission) to continue examination of the subject. Either in this way or (less likely) because we did not submit a separate return this year for B.I.O.T. in respect of 1965 under Article 73(e) of the Charter, we may be forced to accept or reject the application of Inticle 73 to the Territory this year. On the other hand, if discussion of B.I.O.T. results merely in a hostile resolution, which does not prejudice our case on the application of Chapter XI to the Territory, there may be no need to go into our attitude to the application of Chapter XI to

- 15. As a "bases" question, it would be unhelpful to make any explanation of our ideas of the strategic use of these islands and we cannot add anything to the statement that no decisions have yet been reached by either Her Majesty's Government or the United States Government about the construction of any facilities anywhere in B.I.O.T. This remains our public position within or outside the United Nations though news of the joint survey party may get out at any time from now onwards.
- 16. Our case on the application of Chapter XI to the Territory is that for all practical purposes the territory does not fall within the scope of that chapter because it as no "peoples" or "inhabitants" as contemplated in Chapter XI. But the weakness of our case lies in
 - (i) a small number of inhabitants of Diego Garcia who might be regarded as a permanent population; and
 - (ii) the absence of voting rights in their parent countries of the Mauritians and Seychellois now resident in B.I.O.T.

/It is

It is unhelpful to our case to draw attention to either of these weaknesses end in time when their numbers are known, when discussions about their future have taken place with the Mauritius and Seychelles Governments and when plans for evacuation and compensation have been made these weaknesses will disappeer. We should therefore leave it to others to raise these matters.

17. Finally our general tactics, given the present uncertainties about use and evacuation, will better serve our objectives if we do not get drawn into a statement on our position on the application of Chapter XI, unless we are forced to do so either by direct question or where failure to do so now might prejudice our case on the non-applicability of Chapter XI in the future.

IV INSTRUCTIONS

18. If b.I.O.T. is raised as a "bases" question the Delegation should not depart from the formula that no decisions have yet been reached by either Her Majesty's Government or the United States Government about the construction of any facilities anywhere in B.I.O.T. and the Delegation should not be drawn into any discussion of this subject. Separate instructions have been sent to the Delegation about this line (reference Foreign Office letter of 27 August, Brooke Turner to Trench, Washington, copied to United Kingdom Mission New York) which do not however invalidate this formula. Further instructions will be sent if developments make this necessary.

19. If we are forced to make our position clear on the application of Chapter XI to the Territory, the Delegation should say:-

"Chapter XI of the Charter applies to 'territories whose peoples have not yot attained a full measure of self-government'. As there are no 'peoples' in the British Indian Ocean Territory who could attain self-government it is appearent that Chapter XI has no application to that territory. Those who go to the B.I.O.T. are a migratory force who go in accordance with the demand for their lebour. Their numbers fluctuate and at most reach at times 1,500. They are, as they were before the establishment of the Territory, as they managers, officials and labourers from Mauritius and the Seychelies. They may stay in the territory for greator pleaser periods depending on whether their contracts or not, but this does not alter their essential character as a migratory labour force."

20. If asked about the future of the labour force the Delegation should say that no decisions have yet been taken affecting the future of those who are now in the Territory for the purposes of their work but, when decisions are taken full regard will be paid to their welfare.

Extract from Mr. Robert Newton's Report 1964 DIEGO GARCIA

"2h ... There is certainly little trace of the sense of a distinct Diego Garcian community described by Sir Robert Scott in his book "Limuria". Sir Robert Scott holds that "the physical characteristics of the island have made the Diego Garcians more down and hard-headed than the residents in the other islands." They are said to be "more diligent in supplementing their basic rations and their cash resources than the other islanders." In the postcript to his book Sir Robert Scott discusses the impact of change and makes a plea "for full understanding of the islanders' unique condition, in order to ensure that all that is wholesome and expansive in the island societies is preserved." and expansive in the island societies is preserved."

25. Sir Robert Scott's visits took place nearly ten years ago. It is already apparent that already little is left of the distinctive life of Diego Garcia which he described. Judging by conversations with the manager, and with others on the island, most of the inhabitants of Diego Garcia would gladly work elsewhere if given the opportunity. The doctor on Dampier, Surgeon-Lieutenant Maclean, who spoke French well and spent ten days on the island, endorsed these comments on Sir Robert Scott's observations. At the time of the survey there was little evidence of any real sense of a distinct community evolved by the special local environment. Since four-fifths of the labour force are Seychellois under 2-year or 18-month contracts, the evocation of a distinctive attitude to life from the appearance of a chance-met individual on Diego Garcia is hazardous. Difficulties in establishing the paternity of some children was a further indication of a local structure - since it could not be attributed to the evolution of a matriarchal society. There are grounds for the conclusion that life on Diego Garcia evolved to meet the special conditions of the 19th century and that attachment to the island in recent years was fostered by the easy-going ways of the cold company rather than to the island itself. The impact of the new company has loosened the old ties and if there is a distinctive way of life on the islands it is Seychellois rather than Mauritian being African in origin and evolved round the coconut palm.

26. Of the total population of Diego Garcia, perhaps 42 men and 36 women, with 154 children, might be accepted as Ileois. According to the manager 22 men and 29 women made relatively frequent visits to relatives in Mauritius and perhaps no more than 3 men and 17 women, including a women of 62 who had never left Diego Garcia, could really be regarded as having their permanent homes on the island. The problem of the Ileois and the extent to which they form a distinct community is one of some subtlety and is not within the grap of the present manager of Diego Garcia. But it may be accepted as a basis for further planning that if it becomes necessary to transfer the whole population there will be no problem resembling, for instance, the Hebridean evictions. Alternative employment on a new domicile under suitable conditions elsewhere should be acceptable."

(15) Commonwealth Office telegram No. Brief 55: Committee of 24, Sub-Committee I - Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena.

At today's Sub-Committee meeting, Jouejati (Syria) accused the Administering Power of ambiguity in stating its intentions regarding independence for the three territories. Such progress as took place was forced on the United Kingdom Government by the local inhabitants. United Kingdom tardiness in promoting progress was designed to assure the permanence of the settler minorities and to secure the use of the islands for British strategic purposes contrary to the inhabitants' wishes. The Committee should investigate the grave matter of United States/United Kingdom military plans and the creation of a new colony. The extensive powers of the Governors were indefensible and obsolete. The Committee could not accept that and independence.

2. Thiam (Mali) said internal constitutional problems were for the local people to settle, not the United Kingdom Government. To make independence conditional upon full agreement by the political parties was a manoeuvre to prolong British exploitation of its colonies. British companies plundered the resources of the territories for profits while their economies slumped. These economies should be diversified. The size of the public debt indicated the extent of their impoverishment while profits continued to flow to the United Kingdom. He quoted the United Kingdom Prime Minister's statements on defence policy East of Suez from paragraph 17 of A/AC 109/L 279/Add.1 and denounced these remarks since all foreign military bases were for aggressive purposes and were contrary to the colonial peoples' right to self-determination and independence. Britain's illegal bases in the area should be dismantled and replaced by schools and hospitals.

5. Brown (United Kingdom) spoke next (text by bag). On Biot, he recalled United Kingdom statement in the Fourth Committee that the new administrative arrangements for certain small islands represented an administrative re-adjustment worked out with the local governments and elected representatives. local governments and elected representatives. We decision had ye been reached by the United Kingdom or United States Governments about construction of any facilities anywhere in Biot. - question of bases in the O.A.U. and at the non-aligned conference, Fourth Committee and General Assembly. The Sub-Committee and the Afro-Asians did not want bases set up in the Indian Ocean and African views on this should be respected. They did not wish to be involved in the nuclear struggle. He asked for an assurance by the United Kingdom and United States Governments that they would not establish any such bases. This assurance would remove much of the disagreement between the Afro-Asians and the Americans and British. It would be a service to the United Nations if such assurance could be given before the matter was taken up in the Fourth Committee. They could not respect the validity of negotiations between a colony and the colonial Power since these could not be on an equal basis. Failing assurances of the kind required, they would continue to press this point, since the reported Anglo/United States plans were a threat to the security of East Africa. On constitutional destance, was always initiated by the United Kingdom and not by the legislative Council about continued association with Britain should not carry undue weight since the council was merely advisory.
- 6. In answer to further Syrian and Tunisian questions about Mauritius electoral system, Brown explained that the 8 special seats were designed to ensure some representation for small communities. The system, which sounded more complicated than it was, had secured general agreement from all the parties concerned.
- 7. The Syrian representative also asked for more information about United States/United Kingdom negotiations on bases, the nature of the facilities and the names of those in Mauritius and the Seychelles said to be participating in the regotiations.

(7) My telegram No. 1872: Committee of 24, Sub-Committee 1 - Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena.

At today's sub-committee meeting Sahli (Tunisia) deplored the United Kingdom's use of armed force to break the Seychelles strike and energetically condemned establishment of military bases in colonies. The United Kingdom Government should be called upon to implement Resolution 1514(XV) immediately, bring the three territories immediately to independence, renounce the dismemberment of Mauritius and Seychelles and the establishment of bases, and authorize the United Nations to send visiting missions to render any necessary assistance.

2. Mtingwa (Tanzania) called for evidence to support the United Kingdom contention that the territories had been uninhabited when first discovered. In any case their present inhabitants were entitled to independence. It was significant that dismemberment of Mauritius and Seychelles had been carried out by United Kingdom a few days before General Assembly Resolution 2066(XX). The United Kingdom had produced complex innovations for the Mauritius electoral system, but the Mauritians refused to be treated as guinea pigs for unprecedented experiments. There was no independent evidence that the people really accepted the variations on Banwell negotiated by Mr. Stonehouse. He was convinced Biot would be used for bases. The United Kingdom might assert that it was uninhabited but it belonged to Mauritius and Seychelles. It would be a first target in any nuclear attack and thus endangered the area. Ascension had been used for an attack on the Congolese liberation movement. He demanded guarantees that the territories' integrity would be respected and no troops stationed in the area. He contrasted United Kingdom refusal to use force against Rhodesia with its audacity in sending destroyers to the Seychelles to quell workers who were merely demanding bread.

- 3. Janevski (Yugoslavia) said events had proved the non-aligned conference to be right in declaring that foreign bases impeded decolonisation. PMSD Ministers resigned and the Mauritius people had demonstrated in protest against British bases in Indian Ocean. The United Kingdom was not entitled to dismember the territories or to use them for military purposes.
- 4. Kofod (Denmark) said it was encouraging that all in Mauritius had now agreed on an electoral system and most on the need for early independence. Denmark's similar electoral system had long worked well. The sub-committee's recommendations should welcome Mauritius's progress towards independence and should not ignore the special circumstances of Seychelles and St. Helena nor the wishes of their peoples.
- 5. The Chairman said sub-committee aimed to approve conclusions and recommendations on the three territories by 20 September.

INTRODUCTION

- 1. The Sub-Committee considered Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 28th, 29th, 30th and 32nd meetings held on 12 August, 9, 12 and 19 September 1966.
- 2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/L.279, Add.1 and Add.1/Corr.1).
- 3. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to participate in the consideration of the three Territories. Accordingly, the representative of the United Kingdom participated in the 29th, 50th and 32nd meetings of the Sub-Committee.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

A. Statements by members

- 4. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recalled that the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had been studied very thoroughly by the Sub-Committee, the Special Committee and the General Assembly in 1964. That study had revealed the true situation in those Territories and had shown that the administering Power had not applied to them the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples but, on the contrary, had done everything possible to retard their attainment of independence.
- 5. The economic and social status of the inhabitants of the islands was deplorable. The administering Power had deprived them of the wealth which was theirs by right and, by granting concessions to foreign monopolies, had made it impossible for them to progress economically. In Mauritius and Seychelles, for example, two thirds of the arable land had been turned over to groups of planters. Without land, the inhabitants were forced to seek work on the plantations at starvation wages or else rent land. The economy was still very largely based on a single crop, which made the Territories entirely dependent on the metropolitan country. The inhabitants' standard of living was declining. The population was reduced to despair, and discontent was growing daily. In May 1965, serious disturbances had broken out in Mauritius, where the economic situation was steadily deteriorating, and the administering Power had used the Army to suppress the protests. In June 1966, a strike had been called in the Seychelles and the United Kingdom Government had brought in military units from Aden to disperse the strikers and prevent them from expressing their discontent. It was thus apparent that the administering Power was ignoring the recommendations of the General Assembly and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Special Committee and the General Assembly should therefore continue to study the question and formulate recommendations calling upon the United Kingdom to take prompt action to enable the Territories to attain independence immediately in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

The negative attitude of the administering Power was based on strategic considerations. The establishment of the new British Indian Ocean Territory, which would form the basis of a United Kingdom-United States security system, was a threat directed against the new countries of Africa and Asia, and it fully justified the fears expressed by the non-aligned countries at the Cairo Conference. The inhabitants were opposed to the idea of transforming the Territories into defensive bastions intended not only for the suppression of the nationalist movements in the islands themselves but also for use by the colonialists against those who were fighting for freedom in that part of the world. A petition (A/AC.109/PET.321) from the President of the Seychelles People's United Party protested against the construction of a military base, and, according to paragraph 33 of document A/AC.109/L.279, demonstrations had been held in Mauritius for the same purpose. According to The Times of London of 14 February 1966, an air base was to be built on Ascension Island; an article published in the American magazine Time on 19 December 1965 had stated that certain nearby atolls might be used as a base for submarines equipped with Polaris missiles. The Indian people, among others, were aroused at the prospect that new hotbeds of aggression would be created in the Indian Ocean, for those plans threatened not only the independence of certain peoples but also world peace. According to paragraph 34 of the document in question, the United Kingdom Government did not propose to modify its scheme to convert the islands into a military base. The United Kingdom was thus in effect hurling a challenge at the United Nations, for it was not only doing nothing to apply the Declaration embodied in resolution 1514 (XV) but also failing to respect the territorial integrity of the islands and defying the provisions of the resolution calling for the dismantling of military bases. One had only to read the Press to see that the United Kingdom was being encouraged by the United States and other imperialist Powers; during the Washington talks held earlier in the year between the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary and the United States Secretary of State concerning the development of military bases, the Australian Government had announced that large sums were to be allocated for military construction in Papua and New Guinea.

- 7. In order to eliminate colonialism as quickly as possible from Mauritius, Serchelles and St. Helena, his delegation suggested that the Sub-Committee should recommend the Special Committee to take decisions to the effect that: (1) the right to self-determination and independence of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena and their dependencies should be reaffirmed; (2) elections should be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage; (3) following such elections, representative bodies exercising full powers should be established; (4) all land should be restored to the indigenous inhabitants; (5) the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of all the natural resources of their Territories should be preserved; (6) military bases should be removed; (7) all agreements imposed on the Territories which limited the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the peoples concerned should be abrogated; (3) enterprises of the metropolitan country should refrain from any actions prejudicial to the integrity of the Territories; (9) any use of military bases should be condemned.
- 8. His delegation would support any recommendations which the Special Committee might adopt with a view to attaining those ends.
- 9. The representative of Syria noted that, despite the clear and straightforward recommendations made by the Sub-Committee in 1955 and subsequently adopted by the Special Committee, the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had to be taken up once again, because the administering Power, notwithstanding its disclaimers, was not yet willing to transfer full powers to the democratically elected representatives of the inhabitants. He did not believe that the reason for the delay was a desire for a better preparation for independence and self-determination. In fact, the administering Power had made but small contribution to accelerating the process of emancipation; it surrounded the idea of independence with all sorts of conditions which cast doubt on its good faith. The reforms which had been introduced in recent years were due entirely to the initiative and toil of the indigenous Government. In reality, during 156 years of British rule, nothing significant had been done to provide for the welfare of the masses of the people, who were exposed to extremely unfavourable meteorological conditions, to spread education or to prepare in the Territories cadres sufficiently enlightened to assume the responsibilities of government, development and industrialization.

- 10. He submitted that the United Kingdom Government's motives were twofold: to assure the permanence of the privileges of the tiny minority of settlers, and to use the Territories for strategic purposes against the wishes of the people of those islands and of the surrounding areas. Syria regarded the information given by the USSR representative on the Anglo-American plan to establish military bases in the Garcia Islands as extremely serious; the Special Committee should horoughly investigate the matter and weigh its gravity.
 - 1. Why, after all, did the administering Power wish to maintain the obsolete istitution of the Governor, who was foreign to the country and foreign to its lture, its outlook and its aspirations, who appointed and dismissed unbound by e advice of the Public Service Commission, who robbed the indigenous resentatives of their legitimate right to care for their own internal security external affairs and who, while he was supposed to act in accordance with the ice of the Executive Council, was nevertheless authorized to act against its ice?

Why should more than one quarter of the national representatives be nominated he Governor, and not elected by the people, and why should the Governor, and the representatives themselves, select the Speaker of their Assembly? Why d he have the last say on expenditure, when the island needed large funds for opment? Why should bills require his assent and, worse still, why could a rejected by the Legislative Council be put into effect by him if he tered it expedient?

course, the administering Power had a ready answer to those questions: untry was not yet independent, it was only in the experimental stages of internal self-government. Naturally, the administering Power, invoking apparently plausible reasons of balance, objectivity and reason, wanted it to be believed that the Territories were not ready for independence and self-determination. The Special Committee was very sceptical about the alleged pace of preparation undertaken by the administering Power; moreover, it firmly believed that the problems of poverty, under-development, illiteracy, cleavage between rich and poor and social injustice could not be solved by the administering Power, but would be overcome by the inhabitants themselves when they were independent and could freely decide their own future, their own form of government and the best way of meeting their own needs and when they would receive assistance from the community of nations in equality, equity and dignity. Credence should be given to the Chief Minister, Mr. Ramgoolam, when he asserted that the country should have achieved independence by the middle of 1964, and not to the administering Power, which invoked the need for a process of constitutional progress as a pretext for the continued denial of legitimate rights to the peoples in question. 14. The representative of Mali stated that the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena was a subject of serious concern to his Government. In Mauritius, there was a racial problem which the administering Power had kept alive with a view to perpetuating its domination, in accordance with the principle "divide and rule". It was in obedience to that principle that the United Kingdom Government had appointed the Banwell Commission to make recommendations on the electoral

15. Mali believed that the constitution of a country and all related questions were essentially matters for that country's people to decide. The administering Power had no right to make self-government and independence for the Territory conditional on full agreement among the political parties concerning a constitution which did not meet the legitimate aspirations of the indigenous inhabitants. In his view, the setting up of the Banwell Commission was simply a manoeuvre designed to perpetuate the United Kingdom presence in the Territory simply in order the better to exploit its wealth and its people; for while the attention of the Mauritians was centred on constitutional problems, the British companies were continuing to pillage the country, whose economy was in a catastrophic condition. Mauritius could not be considered in isolation in that connexion; attention must also be given to conditions in Seychelles and St. Helena, whose climate, owing to their geographical position, was ideal for diversified cultivation. Yet sugar plantations covered a total of 215,800 acres and tea plantations 6,600 acres, leaving only 17,500 acres for other food crops, and the Mauritians, and for that matter the inhabitants of Seychelles and St. Helena also, were forced to import food-stuffs from the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Thus, the decline of the Mauritian economy noted in the working paper was not surprising. In the fourth quarter of 1965, the public debt had amounted to 264 million rupees, or 18 million rupees more than in the corresponding quarter of 1964. That loss to the Territories swelled the excessive profits of the British companies, and that was why the administering Power was refusing to allow self-government and independence for the Territories. Sugar exports had fallen from 334.2 million rupees in 1964 to 289.7 million rupees in 1965, while the profits of the British companies were on the increase. Meanwhile there was heavy unemployment in the island and the Government was advising the indigenous inhabitants to go abroad to work, so that it could make greater military use of the island. He remembered the statement made by the petitioner concerning the intention of the United Kingdom and the United States to turn the island into a military base for aggression. It was interesting to recall the United Kingdom Prime Minister's recent statement that any Power called upon to participate in United Nations peace-keeping operations would have to be on the spot or in a position to go there, and that the United Kingdom could not ignore the fact that its partners wanted it to be able to exert enough influence in Asia and Africa to neutralize existing or potential centres of infection. According to the Prime Minister's own words, the United Kingdom Government had sought to abandon the system of large military bases in populated areas and to establish itself in areas which were virtually devold of indigenous inhabitants and from which its forces would be able to move to the theatre of operations rapidly and at minimum expense. That statement, especially if it was recalled what had happened in Ascension Island two years previously, needed no comment.

16. Mali was opposed to military bases which were meant for aggression and which prevented the peace-loving peoples of the Territories, notably Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, from enjoying their right to self-determination and independence. Consequently, his delegation again appealed to the administering Power to fulfil its obligations by enabling the indigenous people to attain independence, in accordance with their freely expressed desire, in the best conditions. The constitutional problem should not prevent the granting of self-government in the near future, since the Territory must attain independence as soon as possible. The establishment of the military base in the area was an unlawful act. The United Kingdom should dismantle the base and replace it with hospitals and schools, which the people certainly needed much more.

- 17. The representative of the United Kingdom said he assumed that the statement made by the Soviet Union representative at the 28th meeting of the Sub-Committee on 12 August, as it appeared in the provisional summary record, would be extensively rewritten. The new arrangements for the administration of certain small islands represented an administrative readjustment freely worked out with the Governments and elected representatives of the Territories concerned. No decisions had yet been reached by either the United Kingdom Government or the United States Government on the construction of any facilities anywhere in the British Indian Ocean Territory.
- 18. Since the representative of the Soviet Union had suggested that the Sub-Committee should recommend the Special Committee to take steps to ensure that all land was restored to the indigenous inhabitants of those Territories and that the rights of those inhabitants to dispose of the natural resources of the islands were preserved, he recalled that the United Kingdom delegation had already pointed out that the first human inhabitants of Mauritius and the Seychelles had come from France and those of St. Helena from the United Kingdom. He wondered whether the indigenous inhabitants to whom the representative of the Soviet Union was referring were the dodos and tortoises the sole occupants of the islands before the Europeans had arrived.
- 19. At the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the Fourth Committee had discussed the question of Mauritius. The Electoral Commission, established in December 1965, under the chairmanship of Sir Harold Banwell, had recommended in February 1966 that there should be twenty three-member constituencies for Mauritius and one two-member constituency for Rodriguez, giving a total of sixty-two seats to be filled by direct suffrage. Five additional "corrective" seats would be filled, to be allocated, one at a time, to the party which had the highest average number of votes per seat won; a "good loser" candidate of that party, belonging to the community least well represented, would then be declared elected. These "corrective" seats, however, would be awarded only to parties which had secured 10 per cent of the total poll and had won at least one constituency seat. Also, under a "variable corrective", any party with 25 per cent of the votes should have its seats increased up to 25 per cent if necessary by the appointment to the Legislature of the requisite number of "good losers". The United Kingdom Government had accepted the Banwell Commission's recommendations in full, but the three parties forming the Coalition Government had protested. Only the leader of the Opposition party, the Parti Mauritien Social Democrate, had welcomed the report. Most of the opposition had been directed towards the "correctives", i.e., the measures designed to provide assurances to minorities on the island that they would be adequately represented in Parliament and therefore that the main clauses of the Constitution should not be amended without their agreement.

20. In the course of a visit to Mauritius by a British Minister, full agreement among all political parties had been reached on a system of seventy seats in twenty three-member constituencies; sixty members would be elected by block voting (each voter being obliged to cast his full three votes). Two members would be elected for Rodriguez by block voting. In addition, there would be eight "best loser" seats. The first four such seats would be reserved, irrespective of party, for communities under-represented in the Legislative Assembly after the constituency elections. The remaining four "best loser" seats would be allocated on the basis of party, without any qualifying requirement for a minimum number of seats or votes. That system would guarantee the fair distribution of seats among the various communities, on the one hand, and the different parties, on the other. Registration was due to begin on 5 September, but because of Ramadan the elections could not be held before February 1967. If a majority of the new Legislature favoured independence, Mauritius would therefore be able to achieve independence after six months of internal self-government, i.e., during the summer of 1967. 21. Pursuant to the Banwell Commission's recommendations, a team of observers from Commonwealth countries had been established under the chairmanship of Sir Colin McGregor, formerly Chief Justice of Jamaica. Some of them would be present in Mauritius from the outset of the registration of electors. 22. The establishment of the Banwell Commission had not been in any sense a delaying manoeuvre, as the representative of Mali had implied, because agreement had finally been reached and independence was conditional upon the outcome of the elections. That had been the most appropriate procedure, because of the divisions of opinion concerning the ultimate status of the Territory. The United Kingdom Government continued to regard independence as the right solution and would take all possible steps to ensure that Mauritius became independent as soon as possible. 23. He pointed out in connexion with the paragraphs of document A/AC.109/L.279/Add.1, which referred to economic conditions in Mauritius, that 1963 had been in some respects an exceptional year with a record production of sugar and very high exports because of the international sugar shortage during that year. In fact, the receipts from sugar exports in 1964, although lower than those in 1967, had still been well above those in 1961 and 1962. Again, sugar production in 1965 had shown an increase compared with 1964. The Mauritius and United Kingdom Governments had taken measures to maintain the pace of economic development in Mauritius. In addition to receiving grant funds ($US6.7 million allocated for development for 1965-68 and nearly $13 million in further grants and loans for cyclone reconstruction), it should be remembered that Mauritius enjoyed an outlet at guaranteed preferential prices under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement (currently more than £47 a ton compared with the world price of about £17); the preferential price applied to an estimated 75 per cent of Mauritius sugar exports.

24. With regard to the Seychelles, he drew attention to the main developments since July 1964 and in particular to the exchange of dispatches between the Colonial Secretary and the Governor, a useful summary of which was to be found in document A/AC.109/L.279 (para. 75). The Legislative Council had asked the United Kingdom Government for a response to its proposal that the Territory should remain British or be integrated with Britain. The Colonial Secretary had replied acknowledging the Council's desire for no change in the present relationship and suggesting that the Territory should now drop the minor qualifications for voting and move to universal suffrage. He also suggested apportioning departmental responsibilities to non-official members of the Executive Council and the appointment of a Constitutional Commissioner who would visit the Seychelles and consult all shades of opinion, including parties and individuals, before reporting on the future constitutional evolution of the Territory. The Commissioner had accordingly been appointed and had visited the Seychelles and submitted his report, which was under consideration. A strike had taken place in the Seychelles, but the strikers had returned to work, having accepted an interim-wage award equivalent to an 11.1 per cent increase. His delegation thought that that information should enswer the Syrian representative's questions concerning low wages in the Seychelles. 25. The Seychelles were receiving under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts increased assistance in grants, part of which had been allocated towards development schemes ($3.36 million for 1966-68) and the remainder towards the Seychelles budget.

26. There had been a number of major economic and social developments in St. Helena since 1964, which were briefly described in document A/AC.109/L.279/Add.1. Government labourers had received a pay increase of 90 per cent with effect from July 1965. That had caused the collapse of the flax industry but had not caused unemployment, owing to the other employment opportunities available. 27. The Governor of St. Helena had transmitted to the Colonial Secretary a dispatch in which he had referred to consultations which had taken place with a representative cross-section of the community in regard to possible further constitutional advance. The Advisory Council had adopted a resolution welcoming the proposed revisions of the Constitution and asking the United Kingdom Government for approval. Under the proposals, which had been almost unanimously agreed among the inhabitants of the Territory, the Advisory Council would be replaced by a Legislative Council which would include four additional elected members, bringing the total number of these to twelve. The Council would also have six nominated non-officials and two nominated officials. The Council would enact legislation, the Governor possessing certain reserve powers for use in exceptional circumstances. He would appoint committees of the Council as appropriate and delegate powers and departmental responsibilities to them. Those committees would include special experts as necessary and a majority of members drawn from the Legislative Council. The Executive Council would consist of two officials and the chairmen of the Legislative Council committees. The Public Service would remain the responsibility of the Governor. The Governor had expressed his belief that those changes would enable the people of the Territory to take a much more effective and responsible part in the regulation of their own affairs.

28. The Territory already had universal adult suffrage and elections had been held in 1963. Significant and progressive developments had thus taken place in the political and constitutional evolution of the three groups of islands, in each case with the full participation and in consultation with the peoples of the Territories themselves and their democratically elected representatives. 29. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the United Kingdom representative's statement was intended only to confuse and to keep the United Kingdom Government from having to say what it intended to do to carry out the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee. The United Kingdom representative had spoken at length about the constitutional changes, the establishment of an electoral system and appropriate legislation, as though such matters were central to United Kingdom policy. The USSR delegation wished to state categorically that the changes in the Constitution were a matter for the people alone to decide and to ask the United Kingdom to cease manoeuvring to prolong colonial domination and to remove all obstacles to its termination, for it was time to grant the peoples the independence to which they were undeniably entitled.

The United Kingdom representative had tried to refute the USSR delegation's remarks by saying that no agreement had been signed between the United Kingdom and the United States regarding the financing of the base in the Chagos Archipelago, but he had been careful to say nothing about the fact that work had already started on the base. The USSR delegation had not invented those facts; the information mentioned in the Special Committee and the Sub-Committee had been published in the United Kingdom and United States Fress and could easily be checked. Indeed, the Press had revealed that the United States was bringing pressure to bear on their partners to remain east of Suez and carry out their obligations there. Those "obligations" were to police that part of the world. There had been reports in the United States and the United Kingdom Fress that talks had taken place between the United States and the United Kingdom and an agreement had been signed giving responsibility for most of the bases east of Suez to the United States, which undertook to pay for the installation of the base in the Chagos

Archipelago. It was difficult to see why the Press of the two great Western Powers should publish the information if no such agreement had been signed. If the United Kingdom persisted in its denials, it would be easy to demonstrate the truth by sending a mission of inquiry to the spot, as the Syrian representative had proposed; but the USSR delegation feared that the news was well-founded and that all the information about the base was correct.

- 31. As to the original inhabitants of Mauritius, the turtles and the dodos, the United Kingdom had not told USSR representatives anything they had not known and they had replied to its comments. As the United Kingdom delegation had brought up the subject of ornithology, however, he would remind it that other birds than dodos, birds with a larger wing-span, now swept over the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and were used by the colonialists to terrorize the subject peoples. There had been talk quite recently about those that had flown over Ascension Island. The United Kingdom representative had apparently been instructed to repeat the specious arguments that had been advanced the previous year, but there was certainly much more to be said about those modern birds, a species which was neither extinct nor becoming extinct; the 1965 and 1966 summary records were very instructive on the subject.
- 32. The representative of Mali said that although the electoral system described by the United Kingdom representative, which the administering Power wished to introduce into Mauritius, was very complex he himself had difficulty in understanding it properly he welcomed the fact that the report of the Banwell Commission had been approved by all the political parties and that the elections would enable the Territory to attain independence beginning in the summer of 1967.

 33. The representative of Syria agreed with the representatives of the USSR and Mali that the fundamental question was how the United Kingdom intended to apply General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX).
- 34. The possibility of the United Kingdor and the United States installing military bases caused concern in Africa and the Middle East, particularly as bases of that kind had recently been the starting point for acts of aggression that had been condemned by the United Nations. The representative of the administering Power had stated that there was no agreement between the two countries at present, but negotiations were apparently under way; he would like to know whether the indigenous population was represented in the negotiations, and if so by whom.

- 35. Constitutional development must be freely decided on by the inhabitants. The representative of the administering Power had said that when representatives had been elected by the electoral system it had proposed, they would decide the question of independence. He would like to know when the Legislative Assembly which was to be elected would meet and take such a decision. He also wondered how the problem of the different ethnic groups was to be overcome by the proposed electoral system.
- 36. As he had pointed out earlier, Mauritius was subject to economic difficulties because of its bad climate; and the local housing was not sufficient protection from the elements.
- 37. The representative of Munisia wondered what might be the adventages of such a complicated, not to say peculiar, electoral system as the one proposed for Mauritius and described by the United Kingdom representative. Would national unity really be possible under such a system? Would not elections on the basis of universal suffrage be preferable?
- 38. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the proposed electoral system for Mauritius was not so complicated as some members of the Sub-Committee thought. Of the seventy seats provided for, sixty-two were to be filled by normal universal suffrage; only the remaining eight were "best loser" seats and were intended to ensure that the minority groups would be represented in the Legislative Assembly. As everyone knew, the system, proposed by the Banwell Commission, had been accepted by all the political parties of the island, after two unsuccessful experiments and after action by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Replying to the Syrian representative's question, he said that he had already stated in his report that the Legislative Assembly would meet immediately after the elections, or about February 1967; Mauritius would then be able to ask for independence if it so wished.
- 59. The representative of Syria asked whether the eight "best loser" seats would be filled by representatives of the island's Chinese and Muslim population.
- 40. The representative of the United Kingdom replied that it had been decided not to set aside special seats for particular minorities or communities, but that the new electoral system had been framed so as to ensure their fair representation. The new system was less complicated than might appear and above all it commanded general agreement among all the Mauritius political parties.

41. The representative of Tunisia recalled that the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had already been considered by the Special Committee and had also been the subject of General Assembly resolutions 2066 (XX) and 2069 (XX). Those resolutions reaffirmed the inalienable right of the people of those Territories to freedom and independence and invited the administering Power to take effective measures with a view to the immediate and full implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

42. Recalling that the United Kingdom representative had outlined the future of the islands at the previous meeting, he expressed the hope—that the proposed electoral system would not have the effect of accentuating racial differences in the Territories but might, on the contrary, promote the interests of the various sectors of the population. Novertheless, a serious economic and social problem remained. The main features of the economy of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, which was rudimentary and colonial in nature, were a heavy loss of revenue, the impossibility of increasing employment and the impossibility of bringing payments into balance, because exports were less than imports. The situation was so unsatisfactory that 3,250 workers had gone on strike in the Seychelles on 13 June 1966, and the administering Power had had to use troops to break the strike.

43. In addition, while resolution 2066 (XX) invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity, it was clear that such dismemberment had already taken place. On 10 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had stated that new arrangements had been made, with the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles, for the administration of the Chagos Archipelago and of Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches. Those Territories, which had formerly been administered by the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles respectively, were now called the British Indian Ocean Territory, and the United Kingdom and United States Governments would be able to construct defence facilities there. The administering Power had therefore dismembered Mauritius and Seychelles in order to set up a military base on the islands. The establishment of such bases in countries which were still colonized was reprehensible in every respect, and he recalled that his own country had experienced the same problem with the base of Bizerta. The Sub-Committee should therefore recommend to the Special Committee that it should invite the administering Power to take steps to implement resolution 1514 (XV), to lead the populations of the islands to independence, to abandon the plan to dismember Mauritius and Seychelles and to install military bases there, and to permit and encourage the sending of United Nations visiting missions to the Territories. 44. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the United Kingdom representative's statement at the previous meeting seemed to mean that, because they had been uninhabited when the French and the English had arrived, Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena belonged to nobody. Without going into detail on that matter, he believed that the inhabitants of the islands, whatever their origin, were none the less subjected to colonial domination. It was precisely that domination, depriving them as it did of the right to choose their own form of government, which the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania condemned. There had been nothing new in the statement of the United Kingdom representative: he had merely avoided the main issue, the obligation to allow the populations of those Territories to exercise their right of self-determination. There could be no possible doubt on that matter: that obligation was one of those laid upon the administering Power both by resolution 2066 (XX) on Mauritius and by resolution 2069 (XX) on, inter alia, the Seychelles and St. Helena. So far as the latter Territories were concerned, resolution 2069 (XX) also requested the administering Power to allow United Nations visiting missions to visit the Territories, and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Those were perfectly natural requests and there should be no difficulty in implementing those resolutions if the administering Power were to honour its obligations and respect the decisions which the General Assembly had taken in accordance with the Charter. But what had happened since the adoption of those resolutions? The Chagos Archipelago had become part of the new British Indian Ocean Territory. That decision had been taken scarcely a month before the adoption of General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX), which invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity. The present situation therefore made it highly unlikely that Mauritius would accede to independence in 1966, as had been envisaged. Instead of implementing the General Assembly resolutions, the United Kingdom Government had endeavoured to delay the important steps which it should have taken by forming an electoral commission, which had produced what might be called a scientific constitution. The strong opposition to that strange constitution was therefore quite natural, and indeed it was most unlikely that the United Kingdom Government had ever expected the Mauritians to accept it. In that connexion, the agreement which had been reached between the Under-Secretary of State for Colonies and opposition representatives in Mauritius was of no significance because there was no evidence that the discussions had been held freely. The United Kingdom Government should remember, however, that every time it had endeavoured to draw up the constitution of one of its former colonies without taking due regard of the interests of the population, those constitutions had always come to nought and had been replaced by genuinely democratic instruments.

45. The manner in which the British Indian Ocean Territory had been set up and the haste with which it had been done could not but engender suspicion. His delegation had reason to believe that the Territory was to become a military base. Apart from the threat posed by such bases to neighbouring countries in the event of war, the example of Ascension Island, which had been used by mercenaries as a base for attacking the Congolese freedom-fighters, could not be forgotten. The Special Committee should therefore aim at guaranteeing the territorial integrity of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, and ensuring that they would not be used for military purposes.

46. The economic situation of those Territories was scarcely satisfactory at the moment. There had been a considerable decline in both agriculture and industry, which in 1964 had represented 24 and 15 per cent, respectively, of the gross national product of Mauritius, while unemployment was increasing rapidly.

Monoculture should therefore be abandoned on Mauritius, as well as on Seychelles and St. Helena, if social disturbances were to be avoided. While it was doing nothing to stop the Southern Rhodesian Government from depriving 4 million Africans of the right to rule their own country, the United Kingdom Government had seen fit to send two warships to the Seychelles to compel strikers to resume work.

47. In conclusion, he hoped that reason would prevail and that the administering Power would eventually leave the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to rule their country as they wished.

48. The representative of Yugoslevia recalled General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX) on the question of Mauritius, in which the Assembly had, in particular, invited the administering Power to take no action which would violate the integrity of the Territory; the Assembly had likewise adopted resolution 2069 (XX) concerning a number of small Territories, including Seychelles and St. Helena. It seemed that, in spite of the provisions of those resolutions, the administering Power had not only failed to take effective measures for ensuring the independence of those Territories, in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, but it had even undertaken some measures contrary to those provided for in the Declaration.

49. His delegation considered that the development of those Territories was still very slow, because of the interests which the administering Power hoped to preserve there as long as possible. As early as 1964, the Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, held in Cairo, had condemned the intentions expressed by imperialist Powers of establishing military bases in the Indian Ocean, holding that such bases would constitute a threat to the new Afro-Asian countries and impede the process of decolonization. The course of events had shown that the Conference had been right, for in November 1965 the United Kingdom had decided to establish the new British Indian Ocean Territory as the site of defence bases for the United Kingdom and the United States of America. In spite of the resignation of three Ministers of the Mauritius Social Democratic Party and the protests raised in Mauritius following that decision, the administering Power had not changed its position on the establishment of those bases, as was evident from the statement of the United Kingdom Defence Secretary, contained in the Secretariat working paper (A/AC.109/L.279, para. 34).

50. As it had already stated, his delegation held that the United Kingdom was not entitled to dismember the Territory of Mauritius for the purpose of military installations. It considered that the Sub-Committee was duty bound to recommend to the Special Committee that the peoples of the Territories in question should accede without delay to independence, in accordance with their freely expressed wishes and with the provisions of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). It further thought that the problem of the establishment of military bases through the dismemberment of Mauritius should be given particular attention, in accordance with the provisions of resolution 2066 (XX).

51. The representative of Denmark expressed his satisfaction that the Territory of Mauritius was to accede to independence the following year, in accordance with the agreement established at the Constitutional Conference in London in September 1965. Following negotiations between the administering Power and the island's three main political parties, the electoral provisions made in the original draft Constitution, which had aroused some criticism by the parties, had been modified and subsequently approved by all concerned. In that connexion, the electoral system drawn up for Mauritius might seem at first to be unduly elaborate, but a similar and equally elaborate system had been functioning in Denmark for a long time, to everyone's satisfaction. Experience had shown that the system fulfulled its purpose perfectly, which was to assure fair and equal representation of all voters. The elections which were to take place on Mauritius would ensure the establishment of an autonomous Government and subsequently, after an interval of six months, accession to independence. The economic and social situation in the Territory seemed satisfactory, thanks to the determined efforts made by the authorities and the people to overcome the severe difficulties due to the losses caused a few years ago by two cyclones. Moreover, the authorities had been trying for some years to diversify the island's economy, which, at present, depended largely on its sugar production. The Danish Government thought, therefore, that the Territory of Mauritius could advance confidently towards independence, and it was looking forward to maintaining the best of relations with the new State. 52. With regard to Seychelles and St. Helena, his delegation considered, as it had often stated, that it was for the people of those Territories, and for them alone, to determine their constitutional future. The size, population and economy of those Territories might justify the adoption of special constitutional arrangements, which should not be ruled out, provided they met with the support of the population.

53. His delegation thought that in its report to the Special Committee, the Sub-Committee should express its satisfaction with the considerable progress made by the Territory of Mauritius on the path towards independence and should express the hope that the forthcoming elections would be another proof of the population's desire to accede to independence. With regard to Seychelles and St. Helena, the Sub-Committee's recommendations should take account of the special circumstances prevailing in those Territories and should, therefore, not contain any proposals which might be incompatible with those circumstances and perhaps with the wishes of the population concerned.

B. Conclusions

- 54. The study of the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena shows that the administering Power has so far not only failed to implement the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) in these Territories, but has also violated the territorial integrity of two of them by creating a new territory, the British Indian Ocean Territory, composed of islands detached from Mauritius and Scychelles, in direct contravention to resolution 2066 (XX) of the General Assembly.
- 55. The Sub-Committee notes with regret the slow pace of political development in the Territories, particularly in Seychelles and St. Helena. This has delayed the transfer of powers to democratically elected representatives of the people and the attainment of independence. Key positions of responsibility in the administration of the Territories seem to be still in the hands of Whitad Kingdom personnel.

 56. The Sub-Committee notes with deep concern the reports pointing to the activation of a plan purporting among other things to establish military bases in Mauritius and Seychelles as well as an air base on Ascension Island, a plan which is causing anxiety in the Territories concerned and among people in Africa and Asia and which runs contrary to the provisions of resolution 2105 (XX) of the General Assembly.
- 57. The electoral arrangements devised for Mauritius apart from being complex in themselves seem to have been the subject of great ecutroversy between the various groups and political parties. Regarding the Seychelles, the Sub-Committee regrets that people are still deprived of the right of universal suffrage.
- 58. The economy of the Territories, particularly Mauritius, is characterized by diminishing revenue, increasing unemployment and consequently a declining standard of living. Foreign companies continue to exploit the Territories without regard to the true interests of the inhabitants.

Recommendations

- 59. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee reaffirm the inalienable right of the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The administering Power should therefore be urged again to allow the populations of the three Territories to exercise without delay their right of self-determination.
- 60. Any constitutional changes should be left to the people of the Territories themselves, who alone have the right to decide on the form of government they wish to adopt.
- £1. Free elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage should be conducted in the Territories as soon as possible. The elections should lead to the establishment of representative organs which would choose responsible governments to which all powers could be transferred.
- 62. The administering Power should be called upon to respect the territorial integrity of Mauritius and Seychelles and to insure that they would not be used for military purposes.
- 63. In fulfilment of the provisions of paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), the administering Power should be called upon to refrain from establishing military bases in the Territories.
- 64. The Special Committee should recommend to the General Assembly to state categorically that any bilateral agreements concluded between the administering Power and other Powers affecting the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the Territories should not be recognized as valid.
- 65. The administering Fower should be called upon to preserve the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of all the wealth and natural resources of their countries. It should be urged to undertake effective measures in order to diversify the economy of the Territories.

D. Adoption of report

66. This report was adopted by the Sub-Committee at its 32nd meeting on 19 September 1966. The representative of Denmark stated that certain parts of the conclusions and the recommendations of the report did not conform with his delegation's opinion as expressed in the Sub-Committee's meeting on 12 September 1966 (see paragraphs 51-55 above). His delegation therefore could not support all the conclusions and recommendations of the report.

Agreed Minute

In the course of discussions leading up to the Exchange of the Covernments of the United Kingdom and the United States concerning the use of the islands in the British Indian Ocean Territory for defence purposes the following agreement and understandings were reached:

I With reference to paragraph (2) (a) of the Agreement, the administrative measures referred to are those necessary for modifying or terminating any economic activity then being pursued in the islands, resettling any inhabitants, and otherwise facilitating the availability of the islands for defence purposes.

Where any United States requirement is for land owned by the United Kingdom Government but in the possession of a lessee of that Government and it will be necessary for notice of termination of the lesse to be given by or on behalf of that Government to the lessee, there will be adequate notice of the United States requirement for the purpose of enabling the United Kingdom Government to give the lessee six months' notice of the termination of the lesse or such less period of notice as may be specified in the lesse. This paragraph shall not, however, apply in the circumstances envisaged in paragraph (2) (c) of

II with reference to paragraph (2) (b) of the Agreement, the approval in principle by both Governments before either constructs or installs any facility is required only for construction or installation of major new developments. Such developments would be of the order of an air staging base, a fleet support installation, or a space tracking station. The mutually satisfactory arrangements between appropriate administrative authorities would be sufficient for improvement or reasonable expansion of approved facilities already constructed or installed.

III With reference to paragraph (2)(c) of the Agreement, the types of measures considered appropriate by the British authorities during periods of emergency use by the United States will be indicated to the United States authorities and will be reflected by the letter in any planning for emergency use. In the event of such emergency use of an inhabited island, the implementation of measures taken by the United States. In the other constraints of the control of the co

When temporary emergency use is required, the administrative authorities of the two Governments will agree upon the arrangements (if any) regarding such temporary use which may in the circumstances be appropriate.

IV With reference to paragraph (6) of the Agreement, the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom agree to define the terms and conditions for use in exceptional circumstances by commercial aircraft of military airfields in the Territory, as follows:-

- Such use shall be limited to technical stops by British and United States commercial aircraft only;
- (ii) the United States Government has indicated its agreement to such use following consultation on an expedited basis at the time, provided for in paragraph (6) of the Agreement, for the purpose of making practical arrangements;
- (iii) if, however, a third government should in the view of the United Kingdom make an effective challenge, in pursuance of intermational instruments relating to civil aviation, to the United Kingdom's action as sovereign power in denying the use of an airfield, then it is agreed that civil use by British and United States commercial aircraft shall be supended for such time as in the view of the United Kingdom Government the effective challenge is maintained;
- (iv) the above provisions would not preclude the use of military airfields by civil aircraft operated by or on behalf of either Government for governmental purposes, which is covered by the service-level arrangements provided for in paragraph (5) of the Agreement.

V Paragraph 2 (b) (iii) of Annex II to the Agreement does not debar any person who has a civil claim against the United States Government or any person for whose acts or omission that Government is responsible from bringing a civil claim in a British court under British law in any circumstances in which it would otherwise be open for him to do so.

VI In the light of circumstances prevailing in the Territory at the commencement of the Agreement and the use to which it is contemplated the islands will be put, no formal provision has been included to cover the status of the members of the United States Forces and other personnel (except with regard to

The lack of formal provisions in these respects will not operate to restrict such defence activities of the United States authorities. If at any time during the continuance of the Agreement it appears to the United Mindgom Government or the United States Government necessary, having regard to any change in the use of any development in the cunstances of the islands, to make formal provision for those matters, an Agreement will be concluded containing such of the provisions of the Seychelles Tracking Facility Agreement as appear necessary to the two Governments, with any necessary modifications, and such other provisions as appear necessary to the two Governments.

Mr. Fairclough

Mauritius: Independence Commitment

You showed me your minute of today's date about the above in draft and asked me to let you have the "facts and figures" referred to in paragraph 3(i) to (iv). I understand that Mrs. McColl and Mr. Gathercole are

2. I understand that Mrs. McColl and Mr. Gathercole are producing a note for the U.K. Mission to the U.K. about the effects on the Mauritius economy of the fall in the price of sugar. When completed this should provide the material required under paragraph 3(i). I have myself today prepared a brief on the financial position which will serve the purpose of paragraph 3(ii). As regards paragraph 3(iii) I wonder whether there is not perhaps some confusion. In Inderstand fighthe future of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement is being reviewed for reasons which have nothing whatever to do with our possible entry in the Common Market. Ny understanding is that the review has emerged from the hard thinking which has been going on over the past year or two about our overseas aid commitments: and that the Treasury in particular want the C.S.A. to be dropped because it conceals individed and the C.S.A. to be dropped because it conceals individed and the committee the commonwealth countries through the C.S.A. should in future be given on a direct Government to Government basis (which would alsa! be less effective so far as small colonial territories are concerned). I understand however that it is a deadly secret that the C.S.A. is under review and that this could not be mentioned outside Whitehall circles. As regards (b) of your paragraph 3(iii) I understand that it is the case that if Mauritius were still a copy if and when Britain enters the Common Market it would get better treatment for its sugar than if it were already an independent country. In the latter event it seems that it Mauritius were is already as ungar surplus within the Common Market. I have however naked lir. Johnson if he could edd enrything on this points As a segards the question of increased support for the P.M.S.D. (your paragraph 3(iv)) I do not think there are any

Fir. Johnson It he could end anything. In this point Acade in Part Park Park A. Ark W. Lukar Point P. 19.

3. As regards the question of increased support for the P.N.S.D. (your paragraph J(iv)) I do not think there are any firm facts and figures which can be produced. It is undoubtedly true that over the past year or so the P.N.S.D. have been making a determined attempt to broaden the basis of their support and to appeal to all communities. As an example the Governor mentioned in his latest monthly report that a leading member of the haslim community had recently joined the F.N.S.D. and it is to be assumed that he would carry a certain number of fusulin voters with him. Apart from this however it fernot possible to give anything as firm as "facts and figures". Nost believe that there is little doubt that the P.N.S.D. has succeeded up to a point in winning the support of some proportion of the Indian communities (particularly the younger members and also those with a financial stake in the economy); and apparently large numbers of Indians attend the P.N.S.D. political meetings. It is however essentially a matter of crystal-gazing to try and assess to what extent these efforts will be reflected in the results of the next general election. There are no means of testing public opinion in Nauritius by #Add.AssAct.evopinion polls far by-elections. Some argue that the large number of new young voters on the electoral registers is bound to increase the number and the proportion of the votes won by the P.M.S.D. in the next general election. Others claim that whatever the outward signs may be during the pre-electoral period it will be a question of "equaring the ranks" when the time comes and that the wast majority of the Indians will vote on straight communal lines whatever view they may take of particular election issues (even including independence). In the absence of external tests of the movement of public opinion there are virtually no firm facts and figures which can be adduced: it is essentially a matter of waiting for the P.M.S.D. claims to be put to the test of the general election.

- claims to be put to the test of the general election.

 4. In general it seems to me quite impossible for H.M.G. to retract at this juncture the clear and unqualified undertaking given at the 1965 Conference, that we would grant independence if this were asked for by a simple majority vote in the new Assembly returned by the next general election. I am told that it was a Cabinet decision that this undertaking should be given (I am at present trying to trace the relevant Cabinet papers) and that in addition H.M.G.'s decision to come out publicly in favour of independence for Mauritiue was part of the deal between our own present Prime Minister and the Premier of Mauritius regarding the detachment of certain Mauritius augment of the deal between our own present Prime Minister and the Premier of Mauritius regarding the detachment of certain Mauritius augment of Space of the Commonwealth of your minute but would damnus in the eyes of the Commonwealth and indeed of the world as a whole. Since the 1955 undertaking was given we have frequently been asked both at Commonwealth Mauritius: and we have repeatedly stated in unequivocal terms that, in the terms of Mr. Greenwood's pronouncement, we are prepared to grant independence if this is asked for by Mauritius in the manner indicated after a general election. I doubt whether we would even do, ourselves much good with the P.M.S.D. by retracting this safet repeated undertaking because they (like the rest of the world) would be forced to conclude that our undertakings were not worth the paper they were written on.
- uncertakings were not worth the paper they were written on.

 5. As regards the particular arguments in paragraph 5 of your minute I would like to say that I cannot see any validity in the argument in sub-paragraph (1). It is a considerable exaggeration and distortion of the facts to say that the registration arrangements were not in accordance with the local law. There probably were omissions from the registers on which the 1959 and 1965 elections were donducted but under a voluntary system of registration it is to be expected that those omitted are the most apathetic and politically indifferent members of the adult community. In Mauritius it would almost certainly be mainly Indians (probably Indian women) who were excluded so that if we were to use this argument we would have to conclude that if all the potential voters had been included on the registers and had exercised their votes the only result would have been to strengthen the support given to Ramgoolam. For the same reason I do not think that there is any validity in the point in your paragraph 5(ii).
- 6. For the reasons indicated it seems to me quite out of the question that we should at this juncture retract our freely given and unqualified undertaking regarding independence for Mauritius. It is true that circumstances have changed since the undertaking was given and in particular that because of the deteriorating economic and financial position of Mauritius, and the renewed possibility of Britain entering into the Common Market the interests of Mauritius might be better served by remaining a colony or becoming an Associated State on the West Indian pattern. It is however open to the electorate of Mauritius to judge these issues for themselves. Independence will obviously be the Wagnislaus in the forthcoming election and if the P.M.S.D. have any sense they will continue to put across to the people (as they have already been doing) the economic disadvantages of independence. We have however publicly left the choice to the Mauritius electorate. It is really too late in the day for us to assert that the electorate of Mauritius cannot be relied on to judge what is in the best interests of the country and to insist that "mother knows best".

7. For rather different reasons from your own I therefore entirely agree that the only circumstance in which we could possibly suggest that the question of independence should be reconsidered is if the general election results in a very narrow majority (of seats and/or votes) for the Independence Alliance. If the Independence Alliance win by only a narrow majority it seems to me that there is a very strong risk that the P.M.S.D. (if they have any sense) will stage disturbances of some kind. In such a situation, and particularly if there is an actual or threatened breakdown in security, there would be some basis for H.M.G. to suggest that all parties should get round the table again to reconsider the position.

Sub-committee I -At yesterday's meeting Diakite (Mali) questions the assertion that constitutional progress in the territories represented even partial implementation of Resolution 1514. The Charter requirement of respect for territorial integrity had not been observed. The decision of the Mauritius Conference had imposed unnecessary delays and conditions before independence (e.g. elections and a resolution of the new house). The electorate was only a small proportion of the population, the high proportion of persons under age 21 being disenfranchised. The electoral system contained unusual features whose real object seemed to be to distort election results. 1413 2. Miss Sinegiorgis (Ethiopia) said little had been done to implement numerous United Nations resolutions. Delays in holding elections in Mauritius were regrettable and she appealed to the United Kingdom to hold these elections forthwith. There was hardly any political or economic advance in the other two territories. The Deverell report on the Seychelles wrongly excluded independence as a potential final status since the people of Seychelles were anxiously awaiting full independence. 3. Jouejati (Syria) requested more information about the kilowatt output and uses of hydro-electric stations in Mauritius. Why should there be unemployment when a vest development programme could employ everyone? On BIOT he asked if the so-called facilities which had been constructed had the truly free consent of the Mauritian people who owned the islands. Was there wage discrimination between Europeans and indigenous inhabitants? In reply Shaw (United Kingdom) made the following points:-(a) The need for elections before a decision on independence in Mauritius stemmed from disagreement between Mauritian parties at the 1965 Conference about the desirability of independence and the need for popular consultations on this issue. Mis / (b) The delay

- 3 MAY 1967

U.K.Mission New York telegram No. 60 Saving to Foreign Office

- (b) The delay in elections resulted mainly from disagreement over the electoral system. Or timing of elections he quoted the joint statement of 20 December 1956.
- (c) On the voting age in Mauritius he recalled that the 1965 Conference had agreed to keep the existing franchise qualifications unchanged. This was thus a decision of the elected leaders in Mauritius. 21 was an accepted mimimum age for the franchise in many parts of the world.
- (d) On possible wage discrimination he pointed out that there were no indigenous peoples, and no such distinction between sections of the population.
- η (e) No decisions had been taken on facilities in BIOT.

5. Diskite repeated his objections to any precondition for independence which looked like a manoeuvre for delay. Independence could have been granted straight after the Conference. The exclusion of voters under 21 favoured the Europeans and thus the PMSD which opposed independence.

6. In reply Shaw again explained the justification for requiring elections in Mauritius before a decision on independence and pointed out that the PMSD derived support for its anti-independence platform from those of African descent as well as from Europeans and others. A resolution by the legislature was a normal democratic procedure when a country was deciding its ultimate status.

7. Ustinov (USSR) supported Mali's points especially on the voting age. The United Kingdom had obviously not decided to abandon its military plans for BIOT and these were causing growing concern in many countries including India.

8. Shaw commented that the voting age was less important than the fact that the people of Mauritius enjoyed a choice of candidates and alternative party policies. It was for the Indian delegation to make known the Indian Government's views.

INTRODUCTION

- 1. The Sub-Committee considered Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 35th to 39th meetings held on 5, 13, 18, 20 April and 10 May 1967.
- 2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2).
- 5. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to participate in the consideration of the three Territories. Accordingly, the representative of the United Kingdom participated in the 35th to 39th meetings of the Sub-Committee.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

A. Statements by members

- 4. The representative of the United Kingdom gave an account of developments which had occurred since the twenty-first session of the General Assembly in the three Territories under consideration.
- 5. In Mauritius, constitutional discussions between the United Kingdom and representatives of the different political parties in the Territory had already set the stage for independence. At the end of the constitutional conference of September 1965, Mr. Greenwood, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, had announced that Mauritius would achieve independence if a resclution asking for it was passed by a simple majority of the new Assembly resulting from a general election to be held under a new electoral system. In the course of 1966, a special commission had studied the question of the future electoral system and had recommended that the island should be divided into twenty three-member constituencies and one two-member constituency plus five extra "corrective" seats. In that way, the interests of the main sections of the diversified population of Mauritius would be fairly represented. As those recommendations had given rise to disagreements among the political parties, the number of "corrective" seats had been raised to eight and the arrangements for such seats modified to take account of both party and community considerations, and agreement had been reached between all concerned.

- Thereafter, in September 1966, the preparation of new electoral registers had been initiated in the presence of a team of Commonwealth observations drawn from India, Malta, Jameica and Canada. The registers had been published in January 1967 and included one-third more voters than previous lists. The matter now rested with the Government of Mauritius and general elections would be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage at a date still to be set. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies had said in the House of Commons in December 1966 that it was desirable that elections should be held at the earliest practicable time. Since the 1965 Constitutional Conference had agreed on a six-month interval between full internal self-government and independence, it would be possible, if a majority elected at the future general elections favoured such a step, for Mauritius to achieve independence six months after the elections. There were differing views among the political parties about the ultimate status of Mauritius, but it was for the people to express its views by democratic means. As stated in paragraph 21 of the Sub-Committee's report for 1966, a team of observers from Commonwealth countries would observe the elections.
- 7. With regard to the Seychelles, he recalled that following an initiative by the Legislative Council about the Territory's future relationship with the United Kingdom, a constitutional adviser had recommended the establishment of a single Council of twelve to fifteen members with both executive and legislative functions, elected on the basis of universal adult suffrage, as a major step towards full internal self-government. The next elections were to be held in October 1967, and the legal instruments, including the new Constitution, required to implement the various proposals were being prepared.
- 8. The labour disputes which had occurred in 1966 had been resolved by a general wage increase of 20 per cent. A Government Labour Officer and a Trade Union Officer had also been appointed with the aim of improving labour relations.
- 9. Substantial progress had been made in St. Helena. On 1 January 1967, the former Advisory Council had been replaced by a Legislative Council, and a system of committees giving the members of the Legislative Council departmental responsibilities had been established; the Executive Council had also been reformed to include the chairmen of those committees in place of the former official members. Elections to the new Legislative Council would take place, as before, on the basis of universal adult suffrage, not later than 1 January 1968. The Council would consist of twelve elected members out of a total of fourteen, instead of eight out of a total of sixteen as at present.

- 10. The three Territories under discussion had certain features in common: they all were small, had limited resources and were far from the main lanes of communication. In other ways they were different: Mauritius had 750,000 inhabitants and St. Helena only 4,600. These differences were bound to be reflected in the type of political institutions the Territories developed and also perhaps in their ultimate status. He emphasized that since the last session of the Special Committee, each of the three Territories had made substantial progress towards self-government and a final decision on their eventual status.
- ll. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the situation in the Seychelles recalled the arrangement proposed by the United Kingdom for certain Caribbean Territories: the administering Power was contemplating a procedure which violated the legitimate interests of the population and contradicted the various pertinent General Assembly resolutions, including resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960.
- 12. Document A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2 showed that the colonial Power was reluctant to implement the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples: a colonial Governor had been sent to the Territory to advise on the future colonial status of the Seychelles and had recommended three possible courses: (a) that the Territory should achieve only nominal independence guaranteed by treaty relations with a suitable Power; (b) some form of free association with the United Kingdom; and (c) some form of close association or integration with the United Kingdom. In the first case, it was clear that the colonial Power was not prepared to withdraw from the Seychelles and to concede unfettered independence. The second course would constitute a direct violation of the inalienable right of the people to achieve the independence it demanded. Finally, integration would be a violation of the territorial integrity of the Seychelles, as stated in General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965.

- 13. The economic situation in the Seychelles remained gloomy and was accentuated by the Territory's colonial status. In a Territory in which there had been a continued decline in agriculture and industry, it was highly regrettable that most of the arable land was being given to foreign monopolies in the form of concessions. He recalled that that aspect of the situation was to be the subject of special study by the Sub-Committee.
- 14. In Mauritius, too, there had been hardly any progress. At the preceding session, the Tanzanian delegation had stated that the United Kingdom Government was endeavouring to delay the attainment of independence and circumvent the wishes of the people. By its resolutions 2069 (XX) and 2066 (XX) of 16 December 1965, the General Assembly had called upon the administering Power to dismantle the existing military bases and refrain from establishing new ones in the Territories under its domination. It had also invited that Government to take no action which would dismember the Territories or violate their territorial integrity. The United Kingdom Government had, however, completely ignored the Organization's decisions. On 25 March 1967, The Times of London had reported the measures adopted by the United Kingdom in its new Indian Ocean colony created in November 1965, which was to be used for military purposes by the United Kingdom and United States Governments.
- 15. He protested against the creation of the new colony, which constituted a violation of the legitimate interests and inalienable rights of the inhabitants. It also showed how the colonial Powers were trying to impede independence by such devices as the concessions they granted to foreign monopolies. It was through such monopolies that the new colony had been set up and military installations established. The dismemberment of a Territory violated the express provisions of operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and those of the United Nations Charter. Moreover, the creation of the new colony and the establishment of military installations also ran counter to the declared wishes of the peace-loving peoples of Africa and Asia. It could be regarded as a hostile act against those peoples, who were in the immediate vicinity of the military installations in the Indian Ocean.
- 16. It must be recognized that with regard to Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena, the administering Power had maintained a negative attitude and had refused to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly calling upon it to speed decolonization in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV). Furthermore, the United Kingdom Government was continuing its economic exploitation of the Territories, and more and more foreign monopolies were establishing themselves there, to the detriment of the people's legitimate interests. Lastly, the United Kingdom was openly violating the principles of the Charter and the resolutions of the General Assembly by dismembering Mauritus and the Seychelles and building military installations there with the help of the United States.

- 17. It was not enough to reaffirm the right of peoples to self-determination and independence; immediate measures should be taken to ensure that those rights were respected. The colonial Power should without delay hold elections on the basis of universal suffrage, transfer all powers to the peoples and restore to them the land and natural resources which it had subjected to extensive exploitation. It must also desist from selling to private companies whole islands detached from the Territories and must instead preserve territorial and national entities. The United Kingdom's political manoeuvres to impose upon the peoples the political status it preferred must be condemned, and it must be called upon to refrain from taking any measures incompatible with the Charter and with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Sub-Committee should also recommend the sending of a visiting mission, especially to the Sevchelles.
- 18. The representative of Syria said that the administering Power's statements had failed to answer a number of very important questions. Had the United Kingdom implemented without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly in Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena, as it had been called upon to do by resolution 2232 (XXI) of 20 December 1966? If not, why not? The Sub-Committee must also know whether the administering Power had changed its attitude with regard to the sending of a visiting mission and whether it was prepared to co-operate with the Sub-Committee in the matter.
- 19. The General Assembly had expressed some concern regarding the preservation of the territorial integrity of colonial Territories. Did the administering Power still harbour its intentions, and did it realize that the establishment of military bases ran counter to the resolutions of the General Assembly and could not but create international tension and conflict?

- 20. The United Kingdom had stressed the poverty of Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena and the inadequacy of their resources. But what was it doing to utilize their hydroelectric potential or to remedy the growing unemployment or the balance-of-payments deficit? Had it endeavoured to diversify the economy of Mauritius, as the Prime Minister of Mauritius had repeatedly asked it to do, or was it adhering to the terms of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement? It was surprising that the United Kingdom, a technologically advanced country and a great source of capital, should permit the Territories under its administration to suffer from shortages of capital, and technical skills, as indicated in the Secretariat working paper (A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2).
- 21. The Mauritius Legislative Assembly had called for an end to the discriminatory practices to which the workers in the sugar industry were being subjected. What measures had been taken to protect those workers? He would like particularly to have full information on the role of the Taxpayers and Producers Association.

 22. The Sub-Committee should be better informed concerning the new electoral system in Mauritius and the coming elections. Would they be based on universal suffrage, and when would they take place? It was also desirable to know the role of the parties, to determine the extent to which they genuinely represented the people or, on the contrary, represented special interests. Most important of all, the elected representatives of the people should have adequate powers and the Governor should no longer play an unduly large role.
- 23. In conclusion, he hoped that the United Kingdom would stop giving the impression of wanting above all to safeguard the privileges of the settlers and to serve strategic interests which were of no concern to the people and that it would display a readiness to help the peoples under its administration to free themselves from discrimination and subjection.
- 24. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he wished to reply at once to some of the questions asked by the Tanzanian and Syrian representatives and that he would comment on other points later.
- 25. The Tanzanian representative had said, concerning the three courses envisaged in paragraph 28 of the constitutional adviser's report (nominal independence, "free association" and close association or integration), that they would be imposed on the population of the Seychelles and excluded any real independence.

Page 3 of the document on the Seychelles, however, contained a statement by the Secretary of State for the Colonies noting that the adviser had wished to consider not final solutions but the progressive establishment of constitutional machinery aimed precisely at permitting the people to decide their ultimate status. The adviser himself stated in paragraph 27 that he had concerned himself with immediate measures. As to the elections in Mauritius, he referred the Syrian representative to paragraphs 20 and 21 of the Secretariat working paper (A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2), which indicated, inter alia, that in the view of the United Kirgdom Government, it was most desirable that the elections should be held at the earliest practicable time and that neither the United Kingdom Government nor the Government of Mauritius had been responsible for the fact that it had been impossible to keep to the time-table originally planned. The completion of the register of electors should in principle make it possible to hold elections in 1967. 26. He would have to consult his Government concerning the sending of a visiting mission if that was in accordance with the Special Committee's views. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, according to the United Kingdom representative, the proposals in paragraph 28 of the constitutional adviser's report on the Seychelles were not final. Inasmuch as the people of the Seychelles had expressed a wish to achieve independence rapidly, the solutions outlined in that paragraph could only create confusion and were, in fact, an insult to the people of the Territory. As to the "political inexperience" of the electorate and the candidates, which the adviser noted with regret in paragraph 34, he wondered if it was not attributable to the fact that the United Kingdom was preventing the people from exercising their rights. Moreover, paragraph 47 shows clearly that the "free association" formula was regarded as final.

28. The possible solutions envisaged by the United Kingdom revealed the latter's neo-colonialist intentions. The administering Power had never shown any willingness to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and had taken care, in its statement, to make no mention of complete independence.

- 29. The representative of Syria asked whether the Legislative Assembly to be chosen in the elections which, according to the representative of the administering Power, were to be held in 1967, would really be in a position to decide the future of Mauritius by adopting a constitution and leading the Territory to independence if that was the wish of the population, or whether, on the contrary, it would be a passive body, content to pass minor legislation under the control of the Governor.
- 30. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to the Syrian representative, said that the Legislature could lead Mauritius to independence, if the majority of its members so desired, after six morths of self-government. The forthcoming elections would therefore be more than a mere formality.
- 31. The "free association" formula which the Tanzanian representative had criticized could not, in any case, be imposed. It was for the people of the Seychelles, acting through their representatives, to choose their ultimate status. However, it should not be forgotten that the people were divided, some wanting independence, some association, and others integration, and that the Territory's two political parties, the Seychelles Democratic Party (SDP) and the Seychelles People's United Party (SFU), had different programmes in that regard.
- 32. The representative of Syris said that the current debate was enabling the Sub-Committee to form a clearer idea of the situation. He asked the United Kingdom representative whether, if most of the representatives opted for independence, Mauritius would become independent in 1968. The forthcoming elections were of the greatest importance, and it seemed advisable that United Nations observers should be present.
- 53. The representation of the United Kingdor confirmed that, under the present arrangements, not more than six months would elapse between the general election and the attainment of independence, if that was what the newly elected legislature wanted. On this basis independence could take place by 1968, subject to the views expressed by a majority of the Legislature after the general election. The Government of Mauritius had agreed to the presence of Commonwealth observers to verify the electoral registers and supervise the voting procedures. If a formal request were made that the Sub-Committee should also send observers, he would have to consult his Government before replying.
- 34. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania observed that the United Kingdom representative had still not stated definitely whether his Government's policy was one which would permit the Seychelles and Mauritius to achieve full independence. Study of the documents as well as information available to him indicated that the people wanted full independence at an early date. He also wished to know when the machinery referred to in the documents, the operation of which had already been explained, would be set up. His Government did not wish to be confronted with a fait accompli or to see the administering Power impose a point of view which was at variance with the people's desires. He also noted that the United Kingdom representative had carefully avoided mentioning the dismemberment of Territories, which was a violation of the Charter and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). A specific reply on that point would enable the Sub-Committee to make definite recommendations to the Special Committee and the General Assembly. 35. The representative of Syria said that if the new elections on Mauritius were to be held in 1967, after which there was to be a six-month delay, the island would presumably attain independence in 1968. As to the question of observers, that the United Kingdom Government would appreciate the need for a United Nations presence during the elections. Like the Tanzanian representative, he hoped that the United Kingdom delegation would clarify the question of the dismemberment of Territories.

- 36. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out to the Tanzanian representative that, as the United Kingdom Government's report indicated, it was for the members of the future legislature of the Seychelles, elected by universal suffrage, to consider the Territory's future, and that there had been no decision as to its ultimate status. As to the content of the new constitutional proposals which were to be implemented in Seychelles, all relevant details were given on page 4 and in chapter V of his Government's report on the recommendations of the constitutional adviser, and in chapter V of the adviser's report. The proposed changes would take effect when the general elections were held, i.e., in October 1967 at the latest.
- 37. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation would take note of the United Kingdom representative's explanations. The paramount question of sovereign rights had not, however, been clarified. The documents referred to gave no definite indication as to whether the United Kingdom planned to grant complete independence to the Territories in conformity with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). On the contrary, it appeared that the proposals in chapter IV, paragraph 28 (a), (b) and (c), of the United Kingdom Government's report would be implemented and that a solution involving independence would be discarded, as it had in the case of the Caribbean Territories. 38. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the discussion of the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena by the Special Committee in 1966 had clearly shown that the administering Power had not yet implemented the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and other relevant General Assembly resolutions, that the political development of the Territories was proceeding very slowly, that the electoral arrangements devised for Mauritius had been the subject of serious controversy among various groups and political parties and that universal suffrage had still not been introduced in the Seychelles. The Special Committee had also expressed concern at the establishment of the new "British Indian Ocean Territory" and the reports that it would be used as a military base, and had called upon the administering Power to respect the territorial integrity of Mauritius and Seychelles and, in keeping with operative paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, to refrain from using the three Territories for military purposes. It had also called upon the administering Power to recognize the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of the natural resources, and to take measures to diversify the economy, of the Territories. Those conclusions and recommendations had been confirmed by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session. In resolution 2232 (XXI) the General Assembly had, inter alia, urged the administering Power to allow visiting missions to go to the Territories to study the situation and make appropriate recommendations, and had reiterated its earlier declaration that any attempt to disrupt the national unity and territorial integrity of colonial Territories or to establish military bases and installations in them was incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations and with resolution 1514 (XV). In resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966 the General Assembly had requested the colonial Powers to dismantle their military bases in colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones.

39. All three Territories were, however, still under United Kingdom domination and United Kingdom Governors still had wide powers: in Mauritius, the Governor still appointed the Premier and most of the ministers, and in the Seychelles and

St. Helens he presided over both the Executive Council and the Legislative Council. The people of Mauritius had long been asking for independence, but it seemed as if the administering Power still intended to delay granting it by imposing certain conditions such as that the people should first gain experience of managing their own affairs. A study of the new "Proposals for Constitutional Advance" in the Seychelles showed that they were not intended to prepare the people for independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), but rather to perpetuate United Kingdom control of the Territory, and that independence was ruled out as a solution. Under the suggested "committee system of government", the Governor, in addition to his general reserved powers, would have direct responsibility for law and order, the public service and external affairs, and it appeared that he would retain the power to appoint the non-elected members of the Legislative Council and to nominate three other members. As the representative of Tanzania had indicated at the previous meeting, the proposed new arrangement would impede the full exercise of the right to self-determination and independence by the population in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV). Of the three possible courses suggested for the Territory, the one recommended was not even "nominal independence", but some form of "free association with the United Kingdom", which indicated that the administering Power did not wish to relinquish control of the Territory. That had been confirmed by the fact that the United Kingdom representative had given no positive reply at the previous meeting to the question of whether it did indeed intend to grant complete independence to the Seychelles. It was thus clear that the administering Power was impeding the political development of the three Territories.

40. As to the economic situation in the Territories, it was still as serious as before, if not worse. They remained a source of primary commodities and cheap labour for the metropolitan country, which prevented them from developing economic relations with other countries. According to document A/AC.109/L.375 and Corr.1 and 2, as much as 73 per cent of Mauritius experts went to the United Kingdom, including most of the sugar produced, and, as the Premier of the Territory had said, progress in the diversification of the Territory's economy had been slow. A similar situation prevailed in the Seychelles and St. Helena. All three Territories depended on a single crop, and that made economic progress very difficult. They also depended increasingly on external aid. After the prolonged domination of foreign capital the people of Mauritius were still without the means of production required to satisfy more than 10 per cent of their needs. 41. The social situation in the three Territories also continued to be distressing. There was chronic unemployment in all three and the Christian Science Monitor of 23 January 1967, described the unemployment problem in Mauritius as "hopeless". The gulf between the planters and the peasants in the Seychelles had even been admitted in the document on the proposals for constitutional advance. Furthermore, there were still no facilities for higher education in the Territories. 42. The explanation for London's constitutional manoeuvres and the delay in granting independence appeared to be that the administering Power intended to turn the Territories into military bases. In spite of the United Kingdom representative's assurances during the twenty-first session of the General Assembly that the "British Indian Ocean Territory" would not be used for military purposes, there was continuing evidence that the United Kingdom and the United States did not wish to abstain from using the new colony as an important link in their "East of Suez" policy, a policy aimed at preserving the position of the British and other foreign monopolies which exploited the natural wealth of the Middle East, southern Africa and other regions. The military installations which the United Kingdom was planning to construct in the "British Indian Ocean Territory" would be a direct threat to the countries of Asia and Africa, as the Cairo Conference of Non-Aligned States had pointed out. The Economist of 14 January 1967 had reported that the immediate aim was to station a mobile striking force in the new Territory. The United States still maintained military personnel to man rocket-tracking stations on Mahé, in the Seychelles, and on Ascension Island, which had gained lamentable notoriety as a base for United States and Belgian intervention in the Congo in 1964. There was also evidence that the United States intended to establish a communications relay station on the island of Diego Garcia.

43. The United States was therefore acting as an accomplice of the United Kingdom in violating the General Assembly resolutions relating to the Territories. The Sub-Committee must condemn the militarist activity of the imperialist Powers, which was delaying independence, and which was clearly the reason for the United Kingdom's refusal to allow a visiting mission to go to the Territories. 44. He strongly supported the proposals made by the representatives of Syria and Tanzania at the previous meeting. Since the administering Power had failed to respond to the repeated appeals of the General Assembly and the Special Committee to grant immediate independence to Mauritius, the Sub-Committee should ask the Special Committee to recommend the General Assembly to set a time-limit for the granting of independence without any conditions or reservations. In view of the continuing use of Mauritius and Seychelles for military purposes and the creation of the "British Indian Ocean Territory" in violation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX), 2189 (XXI) and 2232 (XXI), the Sub-Committee should recommend that a visiting mission be sent to the Territories to study the situation and make recommendations to the General Assembly at its twenty-second session. Lastly, the administering Power should be asked to inform the Special Committee before the opening of the twentysecond session on how the recommendations of the General Assembly and the Special Committee were being implemented, especially those concerning the immediate exercise of the right to self-determination by the population, the prompt holding of elections on the basis of universal suffrage in order to create representative organs in Seychelles and St. Helens, and the sefeguarding of the people's right to dispose of their own resources and create a diversified economy. Such action would help the people of the Territories towards self-determination and independence and would show them that they had the moral support of the United Nations. 45. The representative of Yugoslavia said that, once again, the Sub-Committee must take note of the fact that the administering Power had done very little in the direction of allowing the peoples of the three Territories to decide their future status and form of government freely and democratically. The administering Power had shown that it was still not prepared to implement the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and of General Assembly resolutions 2066 (XX), 2069 (XX) and 2232 (XXI).

46. Not only had there been no positive changes in the political and constitutional fields but all three Territories were also characterized by a steadily deteriorating economic situation. The Secretariat working paper (A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2) spoke of a downward trend in per capita income and a rise in unemployment in Mauritius and Seychelles. The administering Power issued warnings about the deterioration in the economic and social situation but took no measures to remedy it. The chief reasons for the negative economic trends had been noted by the Sub-Committee on previous occasions: the single-crop economy, the large areas of arable land in the hands of a small number of plantation owners, and the concessions that continued to be granted to foreign monopolies under conditions which disregarded the interests of the Territories.

47. Another problem which was of extreme concern to his delegation was the violation of the territorial integrity of the Territories. The establishment of the "British Indian Ocean Territory" was contrary to the basic principles set forth in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and was an indication of neo-colonialist plans mentioned in the Cairo Declaration of non-aligned countries. On 10 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had confirmed in the House of Commons that the new Territory was to be used by the United Kingdom and the United States for the erection of defence facilities. The statement on 16 November 1966 by the Secretary of State for Defence that no plan had been made for the creation of military bases in the Territory had done little to remove the apprehensions regarding the future plans of the two Governments concerned. The fact that the reports concerning military bases had not been categorically denied, especially when it was known that certain military installations were already being constructed, was an indication to his delegation of the existence of plans which might have dangerous consequences for the whole area. According to The Baltimore Sun, of 7 April 1967, a spokesman for the Indian Government had stated that that Government was strongly opposed to the establishment of military bases in the Indian Ocean and would raise the matter at the United Nations. The same paper stated that the United Kingdom, in co-operation with the United States, was planning to build an air strip in the Territory in order to assist in the movement of troops and aircraft from Europe to Asia.

- 48. The establishment of military bases could only be intended to check the process of decolonization and threaten the independence of African and Asian countries. The argument that the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles had agreed to the transfer of the islands concerned to the new Territory was without substance because Mauritius and Seychelles were still not independent. The fact that the United Kingdom had been in a hurry to detach the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius prior to the proclamation of independence spoke for itself.
- 49. With regard to recent constitutional developments in Mauritius and Seychelles, he could not accept the United Kingdom's contention that measures leading to the transfer of powers to democratically elected representatives of the people were being taken. In Mauritius, elections had once again been postponed. The statement published by the Commonwealth Office on 21 December 1966 was clearly intended to give the impression that responsibility for the delay did not rest with the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, it was his view that the administering Power alone was responsible for delaying the process of self-determination and independence. 50. In Seychelles, the situation was even more disturbing. There, the administering Power was insisting on a longer constitutional process on the pretext that the inhabitants lacked political experience. Sir Colville Deverell's proposals for constitutional advance, contained in the document which had been made available to members by the United Kingdom representative, were inconsistent with the provisions of relevant United Nations resolutions. Sir Colville complained that the political parties were primarily preoccupied with the question of the ultimate status of Seychelles rather than with constitutional evolution, but that was quite understandable. Sir Colville also stated that the question of the Territory's status could not be an immediate issue. Why not? Sir Colville went on to suggest three kinds of ultimate status which he said were the only possible kinds for a small, isolated island such as Seychelles. All three proposals involved some form
- 51. The United Kingdom apparently wished it to be believed that the measures proposed would significantly improve the constitutional situation. He could not agree with such a contention. It seemed that, under the new system, the ratio of of association or integration with the United Kingdom. In his delegation's view, the advancing of such suggestions was inadmissible in that it prejudged the people's elected to appointed members of the Executive and Legislative Councils would be eight to seven. That means little, however, in view of the influence exercised by the Governor in the councils. The administering Power was clearly delaying the transfer of power to the democratically elected representatives of the people.

52. The following conclusions could be drawn with regard to the three Territories:
(a) the administering Power had failed to implement the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and other relevant resolutions; (b) it was endeavouring to delay the transfer of power to elected representatives of the people; (c) it had created a new colony out of islands detached from Mauritius and Seychelles, thus directly violating the principle of territorial integrity; (d) it was putting into effect its plans for the establishment of military bases on the so-called British Indian Ocean Territory; (e) the economic and social situation in the Territories continued to deteriorate and concessions were being granted to foreign monopolies.

- 53. He believed that the Sub-Committee should, on the basis of these facts, recommend that concrete measures should be taken to guarantee the rights of the peoples of the Territories to self-determination and independence. The sending of a visiting mission should be recommended, particularly to Seychelles, so that the Special Committee would not be faced with the situation it had been confronted with in the case of the British Caribbean islands.
- 54. The representative of Finland said that, in view of the striking differences between the three Territories under consideration in terms of political development, economic conditions, and the ethnic background and size of population, it was hard to envisage any common pattern for their constitutional advancement. The largest of the Territories, Mauritius, seemed to be well on the road to full independence. Elections were to take place in the relatively near future at a date set by the Government of Mauritius, and if the newly elected Assembly decided in favour of independence, it could be attained after a six months' transitional period. After some regrettable delay, the people of Mauritius would thus be able to express their views regarding the future status of the Territory, and it seemed that, although there were some differences among the political parties, the majority favoured progress to full independence. As it neared independence, Mauritius faced certain difficult problems. Further action was needed to diversify its economy, and the problems resulting from the rapidly expanding population needed to be tackled, perhaps through an expanded family planning programme.

- 55. Political development in Seychelles seemed to be proceeding more slowly. There had been little demand for full independence and, in view of the smallness of the Territory in size and population and of its economic situation, some special constitutional arrangement might be called for, perhaps as an interim solution. He noted with satisfaction that elections were soon to be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage and that a new constitution was being prepared. It was important, however, that plans for constitutional advance should not in any way exclude the possibility of full independence. Economic development was a problem also for Seychelles and it was obvious that the Territory needed outside help.
 56. Whatever future course might be chosen by the three Territories, it was essential that the choice should rest with the freely elected representatives of the people. It was equally important that the people should retain the right in the future to choose an alternative political status.
- 57. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the Sub-Committee had heard many familiar assertions from the representatives of the USSR and Yugoslavia, and his delegation had had to reply to them on past occasions. They ranged from the inaccurate to the fantastic. Since the general debate was not yet concluded, however, his delegation would prefer to defer its comments on the various statements which had been made to a later meeting.
- 58. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his delegation had always given close attention to factual material supplied by the administering Power and derived from other sources. If the United Kingdom representative wished, he could produce the sources on which he had based his statement; they consisted mainly of United Kingdom newspapers, such as The Times and The Observer. The United Kingdom representative would find that the Soviet delegation's statements were confirmed by dispatches in such newspapers.
- 59. The representative of Yugoslavia said that, if his assertions were "familiar", the reason was that the colonial Power had repeatedly postponed the accession of the people to self-determination and independence. As long as that remained the case, his delegation would be obliged to repeat its arguments.

60. The representative of Tunisia pointed out that, although General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX) concerning Mauritius had invited the administering Power to take steps to implement resolution 1514 (XV), to take no action to violate the territorial integrity of Mauritius and to report to the Special Committee and the General Assembly on the implementation of resolution 2066 (XX), and although General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX) concerning a number of Territories, including Seychelles and St. Helena, had called upon the administering Power to implement the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and to allow visiting missions to visit the Territories with its full co-operation and assistance, it appeared from the information provided by the United Kingdom representative that no progress along those lines had been made in the three Territories under consideration. He had asserted that the changes which had taken place or which were planned were such as to hasten the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV), but that was open to question since the administering Power had not complied with the General Assembly's request to allow visiting missions to visit the Territories. The colonial period was still too fresh in the minds of many representatives for them to believe everything an administering Power said about the administration of Territories under its control. If the United Kingdom believed that it had fulfilled the obligations imposed on it by the international community, why did it refuse to allow representatives of the United Nations to visit the Territories and ascertain the truth of its statements? It was necessary for the United Kingdom to permit visiting missions if the present deadlock was to be broken. Everything that had been said during the current debate, including the statements of the administering Power, had already been said in previous years. All that the Sub-Committee could do, therefore, was to recommend the adoption of another resolution, reaffirm the inalienable right of the people of the Territories to self-determination and independence and request the administering Power once again to comply with United Nations resolutions. That represented no progress and it was the administering Power which was to blame. If United Nations representatives were allowed to ascertain conditions in the Territories, it would perhaps be easier to achieve a just and equitable solution of their complex problems.

- 61. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to questions which had been raised during the debate, said with regard to the problem of unemployment in Mauritius and the need to diversify the country's economy that it was the policy of the Mauritius Government to do everything possible to encourage the establishment of new industries and to that end a number of incentives had been provided in the shape of tariff concessions and financial assistance by the Government Development Bank. A number of new industries had already been established, or were being considered, including factories for the production of soap, margarine and edible oil, textiles and fertilizers, for the manufacture of stationery and watches, and for the processing of synthetic jewels. Discussions had been held with representatives of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) on strengthening the local machinery for industrial production. In agriculture, the United Nations Special Fund and the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) were conducting a joint survey of land and water resources and were expected to recommend various projects which should lead to the improvement and greater diversification of agricultural production. An Agricultural Marketing Board had been in operation for the preceding three years and the Mauritius Government had just approved a number of new schemes for agricultural co-operative credit. It was clear, therefore, that the Mauritius Government was determined to do everything possible to diversify the economy of the Territory and reduce its dependence on the production of primary commodities.
- 62. Inevitably, the Mauritius Government, like most other developing countries, had sought, in promoting local industrialization, to attract foreign capital. It was unrealistic to regard such policies as continued concessions to foreign monopolies. His delegation knew of no arrangements for foreign investment in the Territory which were intended to operate on a monopolistic basis or in a manner contrary to the interests of the people of Mauritius.
- 63. The representative of Syria had referred to allegations of discrimination in the sugar industry and had asked about steps being taken to protect the workers. Conditions of employment in the sugar industry were regulated by wage councils appointed by the Mauritius Ministry of Labour and there was no discrimination among workers in any form of employment. As to the matter of hydroelectric installations, there were at present eight hydroelectric power stations operated by the Central Electricity Board of Mauritius and a ninth was to be completed by 1969. With regard to the Seychelles Taxpayers and Producers Association, he said that that organization, as indicated in paragraph 64 of document A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2, had for some time ceased to exist.

64. The representative of Finland had invited attention to the problems of a rapidly expanding population and the desirability of an expanded family planning programme. There was now a much wider acceptance among all shades of religious opinion and communities in the Territory of the need for family planning and, with government support, certain voluntary agencies had already made a start. 65. With regard to the so-called dismemberment of Mauritius and Seychelles resulting from the establishment of the British Indian Ocean Territory, as alleged by the representatives of Syria and the United Republic of Tanzania, the new Territory was made up of a number of small scattered islands separated from both Mauritius and Seychelles by many hundreds of miles. The Chagos Archipelago, for instance, although previously administered as part of Mauritius, was geographically much nearer to the Seychelles. For nearly 100 years, all the islands, including Mauritius and Seychelles, had formed a single dependency, and thereafter, beginning about sixty years previously, the islands forming the new British Indian Ocean Territory had been attached either to Mauritius or Seychelles purely as a matter of administrative convenience. They could not be considered as a homogeneous part of either of those Territories in ethnic, geographical, economic or any other terms. The islands had no indigenous population, since they had been uninhabited when originally acquired by the United Kingdom Government and virtually all persons now living there were migrant workers. The administrative rearrangements which had been worked out freely with the Governments and elected representatives of the people of Mauritius and Seychelles and with their full agreement, in no sense, therefore, constituted a breach in the natural territorial and ethnic integrity of those Territories.

66. Some representatives, including the representative of the USSR, had implied that there was a conspiracy to delay independence and impede political development in the Territories in order to turn them into military bases. The clear assurances given by the United Kingdom Government concerning independence for Mauritius and the information provided on constitutional progress in the Seychelles spoke for themselves. The steady progress towards full self-government and decolonization was irrefutable evidence against such allegations.

- 67. Some delegations had also made familiar allegations that the United Kingdom Government was planning to establish bases in the British Indian Ocean Territory. The allegations had been based exclusively on press reports, which were often highly speculative, since the role of the Press in the United Kingdom was not restricted to that of a subservient reflection of government policies. Those delegations should ignore such speculative comment and accept the clear statement made by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Defence on 16 November 1966 that his Government had no programme for creating bases in the British Indian Ocean Territory. Although the United Kingdom Government had announced as long ago as November 1965 that the islands might provide potential sites for defence purposes such as refuelling or communications facilities, no decision had in fact been taken to establish any such facilities. Such possible uses were very far removed from the bogey of military bases threatening the independence of African and Asian countries which some delegations had sought to raise.
- 68. On the question raised by the representative of Syria concerning a United Nations presence during the forthcoming elections in Mauritius, his delegation would be prepared to seek instructions on any specific request which the Committee might make, but he pointed out that the Banwell Commission's report had recommended that a team of Commonwealth observers should be present during the elections and that that recommendation had been accepted by all political parties in Mauritius.
 69. The representative of Syria had also asked about the need to take special account of the interests of the communities in the electoral arrangements in Mauritius. He pointed out that the Territory's population was of several different ethnic origins, and that among the political groupings and parties there were bodies which claimed to represent the Hindu and Moslem communities. Under the previous system, it had been possible for as many as fifteen out of sixty-five members of the Legislature to be nominated by the Governor in order to protect under-represented sections of the community. Since it had been impossible at the Constitutional Conference in 1965 50 reach agreement on an alternative procedure, the Banwell Commission had been appointed to make recommendations which would ensure that the main sections of the population should have an opportunity to secure fair representation of their interests. It was not the United Kingdom Government which had demanded that such special arrangements should be made, but the local political parties and especially the minority communities. Under the new electoral arrangements, there would be eight "best loser" seats out of a total of seventy. Four of those would be reserved for under-represented communities irrespective of party considerations, and the other four were intended to restore the balance of party representation in so far as it had been disturbed by the previous award of four seats on a purely communal basis. The arrangement was essentially a compromise. The United Kingdom Government had throughout not wished to impose any solution and the arrangements now in operation had been generally accepted by all sides. His Government had, however, while paying every regard to local wishes, sought to discourage political parties in the Territory from appealing exclusively to particular communities. Sixty out of the seventy members in the new Legislature would be elected in three-member constituencies in which each voter was obliged to cast his full three votes and the result of such an arrangement should be to minimize communal influences. There had, of course, been universal adult suffrage in Mauritius since 1958.

70. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that he would like to make some preliminary comments on the United Kingdom representative's statement. The United Kingdom representative, in attempting to justify the dismemberment of Mauritius and Seychelles, had spoken of distances of many hundreds of miles, but it might be pointed out that the islands in question were many thousands of miles from the United Kingdom. That fact showed the extent to which the United Kingdom regarded geographical proximity as a prerequisite for the existence of a nation. At any rate, the islands in question had always been treated as part of Mauritius and Seychelles. If the facts were as the United Kingdom presented them, one could only assume that the United Kingdom had been systematically misleading the United Nations in the information it had been submitting. If that was not the case, the United Kingdom must admit that it was now pursuing a policy incompatible with the United Nations Charter as well as contrary to the wishes of the freedom-loving and peace-loving peoples of Africa and Asia.

- 7). The United Kingdom representative had said that military bases were not now being built on the Indian Ocean islands, but the Tanzanian delegation would like to hear it stated that the United Kingdom Government did not intend to place any military installations, equipment or personnel on the islands, since any such installations and personnel could only be intended for aggressive purposes. The establishment by the United Kingdom of military installations in the Indian Ocean must be seen as part of the military strategy of imperialism. The installations were undoubtedly intended for use against peoples engaged in the legitimate struggle for liberation. The United Kingdom had refused to use force where it was justified, to oust Ian Smith's régime in Southern Rhodesia, but was using all the military means at its disposal against the struggling peoples of Aden and other areas. He would like to be told whether or not the United Kingdom had any military personnel or installations, including military transportation facilities, on the islands. 72. With regard to the reliability of press reports, the question was whether the United Kingdom Government had denied the reports. The Times of London had reported on 25 March 1967 that the United Kingdom was in the final stages of negotiations to buy three privately owned islands in the area for defence purposes. If the United Kingdom Government did not formally deny such reports, his delegation would assume that they were true.
- 73. The United Kingdom representative had dwelt at length on the need for the representation of the various communities in Mauritius. The United Kingdom, ever since it had controlled Mauritius, had pursued a systematic policy of isolating one group from another, in accordance with the principle "divide and rule". Now, when the nationalists called for independence, the colonial Power claimed that the people were divided. The electoral system under which each voter would be obliged to cast three votes was one which had been tried in Tanganyika prior to its independence and had since been discarded. Such a system actually amounted to a denial of the right of vote, as he would show in more detail at a subsequent meeting. 74. With regard to Seychelles, the United Kingdom had still not indicated that it would accede to the people's demand for independence. "Decolonization" could mean anything, and the Special Committee had seen how the United Kingdom interpreted that term in the case of six Territories in the Caribbean. He would like to be told that under the policy of the United Kingdom Government the people's demand for independence would be granted.

75. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to the remarks of the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, said that that representative had claimed that the islands forming the British Indian Ocean Territory were part of Mauritius and Seychelles, but the only evidence he had adduced was that the islands had formerly been treated as part of Mauritius or of Seychelles for administrative purposes. That was true, but, in his view, irrelevant.

76. He formally repudiated the Tanzanian representative's unsubstantiated charge that the United Kingdom had misled the United Nations in the information it had provided on the Territories under discussion. The United Kingdom had never withheld any information relevant to the Special Committee's work, and had indeed gone much further than was strictly required by criteria of relevance. The Tanzanian representative might disbelieve the statements of official United Kingdom spokesmen if he wished, but his counter-assertions had no basis in fact. The matter referred to in The Times report cited by the Tanzanian representative had been dealt with in a statement by the Secretary of State for Defence, on 12 April 1967, who had said that the freehold of the islands in question, which were part of the British Indian Ocean Territory, had been acquired by the Government in order to ensure that they would be available for any facilities, such as refuelling or communications, which the Government might wish to establish there. The United Kingdom had provided full information on the Territories every year from 1964 onwards. There was little purpose in continually furnishing information if it was to be continually ignored. 77. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that he would like to comment on a number of matters touched on by the United Kingdom representative. That representative had asserted that the administering Power was making efforts to diversify the economy of the Territories under discussion. It was clear, however, that any such efforts had been inadequate. There was chronic unemployment on the islands, and skilled workers were obliged to emigrate to find work. In a survey carried out by Barclays Benk, it had been stated that the United Kingdom had not been vigorous enough in its efforts to help the people of the Territories to help themselves. Basic goods required to meet the essential needs of the people had to be imported.

- 78. The United Kingdom representative's claim that his Government's military activities in the area were not impeding the progress of the Territories to independence would not bear examination. Preparation for self-determination must include efforts to build up the economy, and the Secretariat paper (A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2) showed that military activities were impeding economic development. In paragraph 114 (A/AC.109/L.374/Corr.2) it was stated that, from 1965, the major single source of income in St. Helena had been employment in "communication stations" on Ascension Island i.e., a military base. Five flax mills which had been in operation in 1965 had been closed down, clearly because the labour force had been lured to the bases by advantages offered them and diverted from normal activities essential for economic independence.
 - 79. The administering Power had denied that it was dismembering the Territories of Mauritius and Seychelles. Clearly the United Kingdom was ignoring General Assembly resolution 2232 (XXI), which stated unambiguously that any attempt at the disruption of the territorial integrity of colonial Territories and the establishment of military bases and installations there was incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). 80. The representative of the administering Power had cast doubt on the veracity of reports quoted from the United Kingdom Press. He did not think, however, that the United Kingdom delegation could dispute the fact that, on 15 June 1966, the British Prime Minister had indicated that it was his Government's policy to avoid establishing large bases in populated areas and instead to rely on staging posts such as those available in the Indian Ocean, where there was virtually no local population, so that United Kingdom forces could get speedily to where they were needed at minimum cost. That statement spoke for itself.
 - 81. The assertion that the islands in question had no population of their own was questionable. The United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies had stated in 1965 that there were 1,400 people living on the islands. The inhabitants certainly did not wish to see their islands handed over to the United Kingdom for use as military bases.

82. It was asserted that the United Kingdom's military activities were not slowing progress towards independence, and that the local governments had agreed. But the agreement of governments which were not independent could not be considered valid. Under General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), self-determination must not be subject to any conditions, and no form of pressure must be exercised on the people. Once independent, the new nations could enter into whatever arrangements they wished. 83. The representative of Yugoslavia recalled that his delegation was one of those which had raised the question of the establishment of United Kingdom military bases in the Territories. The United Kingdom representative had once again referred to the statement made on 16 November 1966 by the Secretary of State for Defence that no plan had been made for the creation of military bases in the British Indian Ocean Territory. The Yugoslav delegation did not regard that statement as a categorical denial by the United Kingdom Government, since it left open the possibility of the establishment of such bases in the future. According to the United Kingdom representative, members were basing their views on press reports, which were often highly speculative. He pointed out, however, that when he had said at the Sub-Committee's 36th meeting that the Indian Government was strongly opposed to the establishment of military bases in the Indian Ocean, he had relied on a statement by a spokesman for that Government.

84. He regretted that the United Kingdom representative had not deemed it necessary to discuss the points raised in his statement regarding the preoccupation of the political parties in Seychelles with the question of the ultimate status of the Territory. In his delegation's view, that preoccupation meant that the people of Seychelles were not interested in a prolonged process of constitutional evolution. Furthermore, his delegation considered that the changes in the ratio of elected to appointed members of the Executive and Legislative Councils did not represent a significant improvement in the constitutional situation.

85. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, speaking in exercise of his right of reply, said that the United Kingdom representative's second statement had served to confirm what he himself had said earlier. The United Kingdom representative had informed members that his Government had been providing information on the new colony only since 1964. However, the Sub-Committee had been in existence for some time before that year. What the Tanzanian delegation wished to call into question, however, was not the transmission of information but the type of information transmitted. If the Territory in question had been a United Kingdom colony, why would that country pay £3 million to Mauritius as compensation for the inclusion of certain of its islands in the "British Indian Ocean Territory"? Colonialism under any guise was a crime against humanity and military aggression was even worse.

86. At a previous meeting the United Kingdom Government had been called upon to indicate whether its policy was to lead the Territories to independence. The United Kingdom Government had ignored the demand of the people of Seychelles for unfettered independence. In his delegation's view, it was important that the United Kingdom Government should co-operate with the Sub-Committee and the Special Committee and agree to the sending of a visiting mission to Mauritius and Seychelles. It was essential that that Government should renounce its colonial policy in those Territories.

87. The representative of Tunisia recalled that a recent resolution of the General Assembly had called upon the administering Power to make it possible for the United Nations to send a visiting mission to the Territories under consideration. He stressed that the question of visiting missions was a matter of primary importance and the United Kingdom representative had not given a satisfactory reply in that regard. It was necessary for members to have a clear idea of the United Kingdom Government's position on the possibility of sending a visiting mission to Mauritius and Sevchelles for the purpose of ascertaining the situation in those Territories. With regard to Mauritius, the United Kingdom representative had said that a group of observers from the Commonwealth would be invited to be present during the forthcoming elections. But he had said nothing about the Seychelles or St. Helena. In any event, what was of concern to members was the role of the United Nations. 88. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that the statement made in Parliament by the Secretary of State for Defence on 16 November 1966 had been in reply to a question concerning the estimated cost of establishing military bases in the British Indian Ocean Territory. The Secretary had said that as no plan had been made for the creation of such bases, he could not give any figure for the cost of such a scheme. The Soviet Union representative had referred to a statement made by the United Kingdom Prime Minister on 16 June 1966. However, a careful reading of that statement would not reveal any inconsistency, since the Prime Minister had spoken of the possibility of establishing facilities for refuelling and communications purposes.

- 89. With regard to the question of population, he had pointed out that there was no indigenous population in the British Indian Ocean Territory and that most of the people living there were migrant workers. The Soviet representative had again claimed that military activities in the area impeded constitutional development. He himself did not think that that view would be shared by the inhabitants of Melta or Singapore. In any event, his Government was not conducting any military activities in any of the Territories under consideration. The United Kingdom Government had provided a grant of £3 million to Mauritius and, in the case of the Seychelles, had undertaken to build an international airfield, which would contribute greatly to the economic development of the Territory. The Soviet Union representative had referred to figures in the Secretariat Working Paper (A/AC.109/L.374/Corr.2) and had claimed that the solution of unemployment in St. Helena was dependent on military activities. The United Kingdom delegation wished to point out that a total of 342 St. Helenians - as against 323 in 1964 had worked on Ascension Island in 1965 and that of that total, 150 had been employed by British Government Cable and Wireless, Limited and 68 by the Ministry of Public Buildings and Works for the construction of a British Broadcasting Corporation relay station.
- 90. With regard to the Tanzanian representative's remarks concerning the transmission of information by the United Kingdom delegation, he wished to point out that his delegation had always provided full information on the Territories and that it was his understanding that the Sub-Committee had first begun to consider Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena in 1964. Since then, his delegation had provided information on those Territories to the Sub-Committee and the Fourth Committee in 1965 and 1966.
- 91. His delegation took note of the comments of the Tunisian representative, and his Government would consider any request made by the Sub-Committee as a whole concerning the sending of visiting missions.

- The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said, with regard to British Government Cable and Wireless, Limited, that its activities were not solely concerned with civilian operations. The United Kingdom newspaper,

 The Observer, had said that the cable was likely to become the main channel for relaying data back to Cape Kennedy. It was obvious that such data would be of a military nature. With regard to St. Helena and Ascension Island, he noted that the United Kingdom and the Republic of South Africa had recently held negotiations concerning the Simonstown naval base. According to a report in The Times, it had been agreed that the United Kingdom would continue to enjoy the right to fly over South Africa in the event of trouble in the Middle East. It was thus clear that those negotiations had been designed to serve the interests of the United Kingdom and to enable that country to hinder the progress of the peoples of the Middle East towards independence.
- 93. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said it was obvious that the representative of the United Kingdom and he were not speaking the same language. The representative of the United Kingdom had said that his Government had made a grant to Mauritius. Yet, according to paragraph 40 of document A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2, on 20 December 1966, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State had said that the United Kingdom had provided Mauritius with financial aid totalling $8.1 million, in addition to the compensation of £3 million paid for the inclusion of certain groups of its islands in the British Indian Ocean Territory. That showed clearly that the United Kingdom had had to pay for those islands.
- 94. The representative of Yugoslavia said that his delegation continued to hold the view that the statement made by the Secretary of State for Defence did not constitute a denial of any intention on the part of the United Kingdom to establish military bases in the new colony.
- 95. The representative of Mali noted that, in his initial statement at the 35th meeting, the United Kingdom representative had said that, in Mauritius, constitutional discussions between the United Kingdom and the representatives of the various political parties had already set the stage for independence thus implying that there was no need for the Sub-Committee to consider whether General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was being implemented. That was an over-simplification of the situation. Indeed, if one examined the political and economic situation in Mauritius, as in the other two Territories under discussion, one found that resolution 1514 (XV) was not being implemented and that basic United Nations principles were being disregarded. According to those principles, peoples had a right to self-determination and independence, decisions on constitutional changes must be left in the hands of the peoples themselves, territorial integrity must be respected and - a principle which was vital to genuine independence - the right of peoples to sovereignty over their natural resources must be guaranteed. All those principles were being flouted. In addition, military bases were being established in the Territories, despite the General Assembly decision that the establishment of such bases in colonial territories was incompatible with the United Nations Charter and resolution 1514 (XV).

96. The United Kingdom representative had gone on to say that, at the end of the Constitutional Conference held in 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had announced that Mauritius would achieve independence if a resolution asking for it was passed by a simple majority of the Legislative Assembly resulting from a new general election. He found that condition surprising. He would have thought that a constitutional conference would represent the last step before independence; the requirement for new elections constituted a barrier in the path to independence. It was hard for him to conceive of a people deciding against independence, but apparently the United Kingdom hoped to ensure that the complexion of the new Assembly was favourable to it.

97. With regard to the arrangements for the elections he noted that, according to paragraph 18 of the Secretariat working paper (A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2) the total electorate was about 340,000, or 48 per cent of the population. Since the rate of population growth was high and the population was predominantly young, the minimum voting age of twenty-one had the effect of excluding a large part of the population, and giving the electorate an unrepresentative character. That illustrated the danger of allowing the United Kingdom to organize the elections to a body which was to vote on the question of independence.

98. Paragraph 16 of the Secretariat paper revealed that a number of seats were to be filled by the "best losers" in the elections. He found such an arrangement extraordinary, since it meant seating people who had been rejected by the electorate and thus reversing the democratic decision of the people.

99. It was clear from the Secretariat paper that there had been no economic progress in any of the Territories and that no attempt was being made to alter the structure of the economy in order to ensure economic progress in the future. Mauritius depended essentially on the production of sugar and coffee. In view of the world market situation with regard to coffee, with severe fluctuations in prices and low price levels, coffee-producing countries were trying hard to redirect their production. It was clear that coffee provided no basis for economic development, and the situation was similar with regard to sugar. As far as employment was concerned, economic growth was not keeping pace with the rapid rise in population and chronic unemployment and underemployment resulted. No real solution to that problem was yet in sight. 100. The representative of Ethiopia said that very little had been accomplished towards implementing the provisions of relevant General Assembly resolutions in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena. The Special Committee and the General Assembly had repeatedly reaffirmed the right of the people of those Territories to freedom and independence and had invited the administering Power to take effective measures to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Yet the Sub-Committee was obliged to take up the question once again. In September 1966, the United Kingdom delegation had informed the Sub-Committee that registration for the purpose of the new elections had been due to begin on 1 September 1966 but, because of Ramadan, the elections could not be held before February 1967; it had added that Mauritius could thus achieve independence during the summer of 1967. 101. At the 35th meeting, however, in reply to a question from the representative of Syria, the United Kingdom representative had said that independence would probably be obtained in 1968. For certain reasons, the elections due to be held in February 1967 had been postponed. She regretted to have to say that her delegation was not satisfied with the reasons given for the delay. The Ethiopian delegation urged the United Kingdom Government to hold the promised elections at an early date. The people of Mauritius had expressed their wish for independence in 1965 at the London Constitutional Conference, but they were still waiting for the day of independence to arrive. Her delegation appealed to the administering Power to implement fully the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and People.

102. With regard to Seychelles and St. Helena, developments were still very slow; hardly any progress had been made in either the political, economic or social situation. As could be seen from Sir Colville Deverell's report, the situation in Seychelles remained serious. Sir Colville had expressed the opinion that, in view of the political inexperience of the people, constitutional evolution should proceed "with reasonable deliberation", and had complained that the preoccupation of the political parties with the question of the ultimate status of Seychelles was distracting attention from the more immediate matter of the next steps along the path of constitutional evolution. Whatever Sir Colville's views on the people's preoccupation with the question of the Territory's ultimate status might be, her conclusion was that the people of Seychelles were anxiously awaiting full independence. She would therefore like to see the administering Power comply with the people's wishes on the basis of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and other relevant resolutions.

103. As to economic conditions, Seychelles had been unable to balance its budget without external aid since 1958, unemployment was increasing, the rate of population growth was rising and agricultural production remained static. That was a sad situation in a country soon to become independent, and her delegation urged the United Kingdom Government to take immediate steps to help Seychelles cope with its economic and social problems.

104. She had also noted that very little progress had been made in St. Helena in the economic, social and political fields. Her delegation appealed to the administering Power to implement resolution 1514 (XV) and other relevant General Assembly resolutions in respect of St. Helena. Most particularly, as far as all three Territories were concerned, it recommended that the administering Power should do its utmost to solve the educational, social and economic problems with which they were faced.

105. The representative of Syria, referring to the answers given to his questions by the representative of the United Kingdom, thought he was justified in asking what was the potential economic wealth of the Territories and to what extent that potential had been realized for the benefit of the population. There were indications that Mauritius had considerable potential in hydroelectric power, yet, according to the representative of the administering Power, there were only eight hydroelectric stations now in operation and a ninth under construction. He would be interested to know what the production was in kilowatts, to what use it was put and whether it was helping to raise the economic standard of the population.

106. The representative of the administrative Power had indicated that unemployment was decreasing, but he wondered why there was any unemployment at all in a place which was apparently so rich in natural resources and when a relatively extensive economic development project might absorb all available manpower, and even require more. The United Kingdom had both the capital and technical knowledge for such a project.

107. The representative of the United Kingdom had dwelt on the benign nature of the strategic installations on the islands, claiming that they were only refuelling stations. He wondered whether they had been constructed on Mauritian land with the express free consent of the people. If not, were they not impeding self-determination and independence?

108. He welcomed the assurance given that there was no discrimination in the sugar or other industries, but asked what were the salary scales for Europeans and indigenous employees and whether the latter had access to managerial positions.
109. He urged the administering Power to give replies that provided a comprehensive picture of the islands under its administration, and not merely partial answers. What was important was that the people should freely exercise their right to self-determination, that there should be social, economic and political progress and that the sovereignty of the people and the territorial integrity of their land should be respected. The Sub-Committee should not base its conclusions on the opinion of the administering Power as to what was reasonable.

110. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to the comments made by the representative of Mali concerning the delay in granting independence to Mauritius following the 1965 Constitutional Conference and the requirement that a new Legislature should approve a request for independence, referred him to the report of that Conference, which had made it very clear that there had by no means been agreement as to whether the issue of independence had been fully considered at previous general elections and that it had been decided by the parties represented at the Conference that steps should be taken to review the electoral arrangements before new elections were held. Two points of view had been expressed: one had been that there was no need to consult the people regarding the future status of Mauritius since their desire for independence had been demonstrated by their support in three general elections for the parties favouring independence, but that it would be appropriate to hold general elections before independence so that the newly elected Government could lead the country into independence; the opposing argument advanced had been that the question of independence had not been a prominent issue in previous general elections and it was therefore doubtful whether the voters really desired it.

lll. Those had been the views not of the United Kingdom Government, but of the parties represented at the Conference. Agreement had therefore been reached on the procedure he had described and, if a majority of the newly elected Legislature so decided, independence could be granted within a period of six months. The reasons why the approval of a majority in the Legislature was required were perfectly clear to anyone familiar with democratic procedures. As he had made clear in earlier statements, the delay in holding general elections had been caused by the process of reviewing the electoral system and the initiative now lay with the Government of Mauritius. In December 1966, the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies, after discussions with the Frime Minister of Mauritius, had expressed the hope that the latter would share his wish for early elections and the Prime Minister of Mauritius had confirmed that he wished elections to be held in 1967. The United Kingdom could do no more; the initiative for holding elections lay with the Mauritians themselves.

112. On the question of the voting age, which had also been raised by the representative of Mali, the franchise arrangements had been reviewed at the 1965 Constitutional Conference and the leaders of the parties represented had agreed to leave it unchanged. It had therefore been the decision of the Mauritian representatives themselves. There was, moreover, nothing unusual in a minimum voting age of 21; that was the case in many countries.

113. With reference to the salary scale in the sugar industry, he assured the representative of Syria that no sections of the population of Mauritius could be regarded as indigenous in the sense valid in other parts of the world. No distinction was made in the sugar industry between the Europeans and other sections of the population.

114. He repeated that no refuelling facilities had so far been constructed in the British Indian Ocean Territory and no decision had yet been taken to do so. 115. The representative of Mali said that he had been surprised by the United Kingdom representative's answer to his question concerning the delay in granting independence. In paragraph 20 of document A/AC.109/L.374 and Corr.1 and 2 it was stated that neither the United Kingdom Government nor the Government of Mauritius could avoid the subsequent delays. Internal political difficulties alone could not be the cause for the delay; one cause appeared to be the requirement that a newly elected Legislature should first approve a resolution asking for independence. He believed that after the 1965 Constitutional Conference the path to independence had been wide open. There was some doubt in his mind as to the United Kingdom's willingness to move towards the emancipation of the Territory. 116. On the question of the minimum voting age, it should be recognized that the population of Mauritius was a somewhat special case because of the age pyramid and the rapid growth of population. To give the franchise only to those over the age of twenty-one would favour the population of mixed and French descent who mainly supported the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate (PMSD), which was in favour of preserving the links with the administering Power. That indicated what the outcome of the proposed popular consultation would probably be. In many countries the minimum voting age was eighteen. If that were adopted in Mauritius, 75 per cent of the population, instead of 48 per cent, would be entitled to vote and the majority would then consist of young people who did not belong to the land-owning class. The situation presented complex problems which should be studied carefully since the future of a nation was at stake.

117. He was deeply concerned over the strict dependence of Mauritius on coffee and sugar. A country which was about to become independent should not depend on thost two products alone. Mauritius, for instance, was entirely dependent on Madagascar for rice. If something could be done to make the Territory less dependent on the fluctuating prices for coffee and sugar, the United Kingdom should inform the Sub-Committee. It should also diversify agricultural production so that the Territory, which had a rich soil, could satisfy more of its own needs.

118. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the requirement that a request for independence should first be approved by a majority of the newly elected Legislature of Mauritius was no more than a guarantee of the democratic expression of the wishes of the people. It was true that the PMSD did not support full independence, but he pointed out that that party represented not only those of European or mixed descent but also many of African descent who were resident in the Territory. It was hoped, however, that the new electoral arrangements would cut across such communal or racial considerations.

119. In his statement at the Sub-Committee's 37th meeting, he had mentioned the various efforts being made to promote new industry and diversify the economy of Mauritius. Both the United Kingdom Government and the Government of Mauritius fully realized the need for diversification.

120. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agreed with the representative of Mali that the administering Power should give some thought to lowering the minimum voting age, especially since the population of Mauritius did not have a long life-expectancy. The explanation given by the United Kingdom representative was not convincing. What was good for other countries was not necessarily good for Mauritius. Some countries recognized that people already had opinions by the age of eighteen and were in a position to decide how to vote. 121. He had been glad to hear from the representative of the administering Power that there were at present no plans to establish military bases in the Territories, especially in the new colony. That would have been satisfactory if there had not been reports to the contrary. There was considerable concern in Africa and Asia on that point and there had even been discussion in the United Kingdom Parliament. He understood that the United Kingdom representative in New Delhi had been handed a statement pointing out that military preparations in the Indian Ocean were contrary to the spirit of the United Nations Charter, and the spokesman for the Indian Government, to whose statement the Yugoslav representative had referred, was very well informed about the discussions in the Special Committee, and in the United Nations in general, and he was reported to have expressed the hope that the United Kingdom Government would take those discussions into account and would give up any plans to establish military bases in the Territories. He still did not consider the United Kingdom statement definitive; but if it was, he welcomed it.

122. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that it was the elected representatives of the people of Mauritius themselves who had decided to retain a minimum voting age of twenty-one. What was more important was that in Mauritius the voters had a free choice between various political parties and a free choice of candidates.

123. He had noted the USSR representative's comments concerning India's views. No doubt when the question was discussed at a later stage by the plenary Special Committee the Indian representative would make clear his Government's position of the matter.

B. Conclusions

124. The Sub-Committee notes with regret that the administering Power has still not implemented the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) and of other relevant resolutions of the General Assembly concerning Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, and is still unduly delaying the achievement of independence by these Territories. 125. The Sub-Committee notes with regret the inadequacy of political progress in these Territories. The administering Power, through the Governor, continues to exercise vast powers, particularly in the constitutional and the legislative fields. In Seychelles, the administering Power is insisting on a longer constitutional process under the pretext that the people of the Territory lack political experience. Moreover, the new "proposals for constitutional advance" do not accelerate but, in fact, delay the transfer of power to democratically elected representatives of the people as provided for in resolution 1514 (XV) of the General Assembly.

126. By creating a new territory, "the British Indian Ocean Territory", composed of islands detached from Mauritius and Seychelles, the administering Power continues to violate the territorial integrity of these Non-Self-Governing Territories and to defy resolutions 2066 (XX) and 2232 (XXI) of the General Assembly.

127. The Sub-Committee notes with concern that, notwithstanding the denials by the administering Power, there is still evidence to indicate that the United Kingdom intends to use portions of these territories for military purposes in collaboration with the Government of the United States of America. The Sub-Committee is of the firm opinion that such military installations create international tension and arouse the concern of the peoples of Africa and Asia, especially those in the vicinity of the installations.

128. The economic situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena remains unsatisfectory. The Territories suffer from shortage of capital and depend entirely on few crops and external aid. Efforts by the administering Power to diversify the economy of the Territories have been inadequate. Concessions to foreign companies continue and the interests of the peoples are not safeguarded. 129. The social situation in the Territories continues to arouse concern. There is a downward trend in per capita income and a rise in unemployment in Mauritius and Seychelles. In Mauritius, the workers in the sugar industry rightly complain of discriminatory practices. There are still no facilities for higher education in the Territories.

C. Recommendations

- 130. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee take concrete measures to insure that the right of the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to self-determination and independence, in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, is respected by the administering Power.
- 131. The Special Committee should urge the administering Power to grant the Territories the political status their peoples freely choose. The administering Power should consequently refrain from taking any measure incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations and with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.
- 132. The Special Committee should once again reaffirm that any constitutional changes must be left to the peoples of the Territories themselves, who alone have the right to decide on the form of government they wish to adopt.
- 133. The administering Power should without delay hold free elections in the Territories on the basis of universal suffrage and transfer all powers to the representative organs elected by the people.
- 134. The Special Committee should recommend that the General Assembly set a time limit for the granting of independence to Mauritius and accelerate the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) regarding Seychelles and St. Helena.

his ministerial colleagues, argued at the time (in September 1965) for very much larger compensation for the separation from Hauritius of the Chagos Archipelago, and bearing in mind also that the then all-Party Government broke up over the very question of the quantum of compensation, one is forced to the almost inevitable conclusion that the only way of making palatable a disclosure that in fact H.M.G. had been assisted ss to 50% by the Americans would be to offer additional compensation. If this were not done, then the Premier would be held up to ridicule in the forthcoming election campaign for having been "gasped" by the British and would again be attacked for having sold Chages too cheaply in order to secure the agreement of the British Government that Mauritius should proceed to independence, 8. In all the circumstances, and if disclosure is decided upon, the only course which seems likely to avoid a major row with the present Mauritius Government and a major electoral set-back for the Premier and his Party is that he should be approached shead of any announcement and informed that we have been able to secure agreement to some American contribution to the cost of establishing the British Indian Ocean Territory and that in these circumstances we are glad, in agreement with the Americans, to be able to go somewhat further to meet the representations made by the Premier when the matter was negotiated for a larger quantum of compensation. Since, if there were full disclosure, it would become known that the United States had in fact contributed 50% of the total costs, there is no doubt that the Premier (who very reluctantly accepted 23m. when he thought that Britain was paying in full) would expect this to be at least doubled. 9. As to Seychelles, there would also be difficulties although they would not be likely to be so acute. By way of compensation for the Seychelles island forming part of the British Indian Ocean Territory we effered to build Seychelies an sirfield. We had in mind at the time a total cost of £5\fm. although no figure was mentioned to Saychelles, We still have not got firm estimates for the cost of building an international sirfield in the Sevenelles (the report of an M.P.B.W. Survey party is awaited but the strong probability is that the total cost would be more like double this figure. The Ministry of Defence, who bore all the establishment costs of British Indian Ocean Territory on their Vote (and also received the relief from the American contribution) have so far firmly insisted that their contribution to the cost of the /airfield

DEADY MINUTE

(For algnature by the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Affaire)

POREIGN BEGRETARY

I am very concerned at the proposal made in paragraph 4 of the minute addressed to you on 12 May by the Secretary of State for Defence about the arrangements for compensation to Mauritius and Seychelles in connection with the establishment of the British Indian Ocean Territory. I foreses agute embarrasement in our relationship with Mauritius (which, depending upon the sutcome of the forthcoming election, is likely to become a full member of the Commonwealth) and, to a lesser extent, with Seychelles, if there is disclosure of the 50% American contribution to the establishment costs of British Indian Ocean Ferritory. 2. My predecessors and I and officials both in the territories and in the then Colonial Office insisted throughout in discussions on the question of compensation that this was a matter between the territories and the British Government. This insistence was in the face of quite understandable decands that, since the United States was to benefit from the British Indian Ocean Territory and since both Mauritius and Saychelles were in considerable need of assistance of various sorts, the Americans should be pressed to contribute. We resisted this strongly and, as the Secretary of State for Defence points out, the Prime Einister himself flatly told the Premier of Mauritius that the matter was one between Eritain and Hauritius. There is no doubt that the Frenier believed that the full amount of the compensation paid to Mauritius was being found by Britain.

5. Subsequently the Premier was vigorously attacked by the present opposition party in Mauritius for having agreed to the separation of Diego Gardia for far too little by way of compensation and the them All-Party Government finally broke up over this point. The critical election which will determine whether or not Mauritius is to become independent is due within the next few months and the question of the amount of compensation for the Chagos Archipelago is likely to be raised by the opposition party as one of the matters on which they will attack the Premier's record. If, particularly at this time therefore, it were to be disclosed that the United States had in fact indirectly set half of the astablishment cost of British Indian Ocean the United States had in fast indirectly met half of the establishment cost of British Indian Ocean Territory, there would be bound to be a major row with the present Manuritius Government which would cortainly find such a disclosure extrusely embarrassing electorally. It is wellnigh cortain that accusations would be made that the British Government and the Prime Minister personally, had deliberately deceived the Mauritius Government in order to secure their agreement to the separation from Mauritius of the Chages Archipelage at a low level of compensation, the For these reasons I should very much prefer to see the line so far of keeping the American contribution to the establishment costs of B.I.O.T. completely secret firmly adhered to. If however the Americans are unwilling to agree to stick to this in all dirementances, then I am inclined to agree with the Secretary of State for Defence that halfmeasures would be liable to get us into even greater complications and that in the circumstances we should try to persuade the Americans to agree to a voluntary disclosure of the arrangements. If however this were to be tolerable from the point of view of our relations with Mauritina and Seychelles, I am convinced that certain action relating to these territories would be essential. 5. Against the background of pressure at the time on the part of Mauritius for greater compensation, the situation could in my view only be made tolerable, in the circumstances of disclosure, if additional compensation were offered. Since it would become plain that half the costs were being met by the United States, and since Eauritius only agreed with the utmost reluctance to compensation limited to Sim, when it was thought that Britain was meeting the full amount, I cannot see that enything less than a doubling of the compensation paid to Emuritius would have any chance of avoiding the adverse consequences referred to above. 6. It would be essential that the Governors of the two territories should be authorised to speak to the unofficial members of their governments before any disclosure were made. I envisage that the approaches - which would need to differ as between the two ferritories - should be on the following lines:-

(a) Seventelles. Unofficial members of the Executive Council should be reminded of the agreement on the part of the British Government to construct an airfield in Seychelles. At the time that this offer was made it was envicaged that the cost of doing so might be of the order of £3m. It now seemed likely although precise estimates were not yet available - that the cost would be very considerably greater. We had now however been fortunate in securing a 50% American contribution to the establishment costs of British Indian Ocean Territory which was to be announced shortly and were glad to be able to confirm that, despite the greatly increased estimated cost, construction of the airfield would proceed as planned.

(b) Mauritius. The Premier should be reminded that Britain had not felt able to meet his demand for compensation of the Chagos Archipelago beyond the amount of Cim. agreed in September 1965. At that time we had expected that it would be possible to construct the sirfield which we had undertaken to provide by way of compensation for Seychelles for about the same sum. We had however been fortunate in securing United States agreement to a 50% contribution to the establishment costs of British Indian Gosan Territory and this fact was to be announced shortly. Et the same time the likely costs of the Scychelles sirfield had mounted considerably. In the light of these factors we had been giving further consideration to the situation /and and to the level of compensation and sere glad to be able to tell the Premier that in all the discussiones we were now able to increase the amount to £6m.

7. There is a further important consideration which arises and that is the question of possible international reactions if disclosure is decided upon and if, following on this, there are strongly adverse reactions from Mauritius and Scychelles.

It has throughout been a central point in our defence of the arrangements made in the establishment of the British Indian Ocean Territory that the separation from Mauritius and Scychelles of the islands now forming part of the Territory was done with the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Scychelles. Even so, we met, and have continued from 15 gover of

to meet strong opposition to the whole enterprise in Commonwealth and foreign countries and in the United Mations. If, following on disclosure, there were strongly adverse reactions in Mauritius and Seychalles, we should be in a much worse position than we have so far in handling matters concerning British Indian Ocean Territory on the international scene. This is an added reason why in my view mation on the lines recommended above would be necessary if disclosure of the American contribution is eventually decided upon.

Mauritius and Seychelles on this matter but I think it essential to do so before any approach to the Americans on the lines of the draft attached to the minute of 12 May by the Secretary of State for Defence is made. Before doing so however, I felt it right to inform my colleagues of my views as to

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX
(OPD(67) 20th Meeting, Item 3)

THURSDAY, 25th MAY 1967 at 9.45 a.m.

BRITISH INDIAN OCEAN TERRITORY (BIOT)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DEFENCE said that when BIOT was set up we had made arrangements to compensate Mauritius and the Seyschelles for the detachment from them of islands to form the new territory up to a total of about £10 million. The United States Government agreed to contribute half the cost of this compensation(up to a maximum of £5 million) and at the time, to avoid embarrassment in Congress, particularly requested us to keep secret the arrangements for their contribution; for this reason it had been arranged that it should take the form of their waiving part of our payments to them in connection with the development of Polaris. Until recently there had been no reason to suspect that difficulties would arise over this secret arrangement, but the United States authorities had now told us that some American scientists had become aware of the United States! financial involvement; for this reason they were now contemplating admitting in public if pressed that while no cash payment had been made they had made a "contribution" to the cost of detachment of the islands. This proposal of the United States Government gave rise to great difficulties because we had made arrangements with the agreement of the Comptroller and Auditor General to avoid drawing Parliament's attention to the transactions and we had maintained a firm line in public that there had been no United States contribution. The Prime Minister had also informed the Premier of Mauritius that this was a matter solely between ourselves and Mauritius, in rebutting his proposal that the United States should help Mauritius and the Seychelles. Mr. Christopher Mayhew MP was also aware of the transaction through his former appointment as Minister of Defence for the Royal Navy. He (the Defence Secretary) had circulated with his minute of 12th May a draft telegram to HM Ambassador at Washington containing instructions to the Ambassador for discussion with the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Rusk, but this would require some modification in the light of a minute from the Commonwealth Secretary dated 24th May.

THE COMMONWEALTH SECRETARY said that at the time when the agreement for the detachment of BIOT was signed in 1965, Mauritian Ministers were unaware of our negotiations with the United States Government for a contribution by them towards the cost of compensation for detachment. They were further told that there was no question of a further contribution to them by the United States Government since this was a matter between ourselves and Mauritius, that the £3 million was the maximum we could afford, and that unless they accepted our proposals we should not proceed with the arrangements for the grant to them of independence. Subsequently the matter had become a party political issue in Mauritius and the Premier had been attacked by the present opposition party for having agreed to the separation of Diego Garcia for inadequate compensation. A critical election which would determine whether or not Mauritius was to become independent was due to be held in August and the question of the alleged inadequacy of compensation for detachment of the Chagos Archipelago would be used by the opposition to attack the Premier's record. We should therefore strongly urge the United States Government that complete secrecy should be maintained and we should not at this stage volunteer any alternative proposal. The Ambassador could be asked to report urgently on United States reactions to the proposition that secrecy should be maintained in all circumstances. If they were not willing to accept this we should then consider further what other courses might be adopted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that the Treasury Officer of Accounts, had obtained the consent of the Comptreller and Auditor General to exclude any reference to the remission of part of a Polaris payment in the relevant Votes submitted to Parliament. In view of the latest report of the United States position however there now seemed little chance of total secrecy being maintained, and the following formula had been evolved by Treasury officials which he put forward for consideration -

"The arrangements made with Mauritius and the Seychelles about BIOT were a matter between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of those two countries. There was no direct payment by the United States in respect of the costs of those arrangements covering such matters as the purchase of land and resettlement of some local inhabitants. BIOT is, however, intended to serve both British and American purposes and in consideration of the arrangements made by the United Kingdom the United States have made some adjustment in other fields which are more favourable to the United Kingdom than would otherwise have been the case."

In discussion it was recognised that there now seemed to be no prospect of maintaining secrecy regarding the United States contribution. There was general agreement that the formula proposed by the Chanceller of the Exchequer provided a useful basis for an announcement. It was suggested, however, that in the last sentence the words "having regard to further capital construction, the United States have now made" might be inserted, to relate the contribution to the proposed construction of fecilities on Aldabra.

It was also generally agreed that the British Ambassador in Washington should be instructed to inform the United States Government that if in consequence of a disclosure of their contribution which now appeared to be necessary because of the action which the United States Government had taken it became necessary to make an additional contribution to Mauritius or the Sayohelles, we should expect the United States Government to bear the cost.

Summing up the discussion, THE PRIME MINISTER said that the formula suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, subject to the addition of some such words in the last sentence as "having regard to further capital construction", should be further discussed by officials and agreed by the Ministers directly concerned. In discussion with the United States authorities we should seek agreement to a simultaneous announcement by the United States and ourselves on the lines indicated in discussion. The timing of such an announcement, which should preferably be after the elections in Mauritius had been held, would require further consideration. After agreement had been reached on the formula which would be used it would be necessary for the Treasury Officer of Accounts inform the Comptroller and Auditor General. The draft telegram to EM Ambassador et Washington should be revised accordingly, in agreement between the Ministers directly concerned.

The Committee -

- (1) Invited the Defence Secretary, in consultation with the Chancellor of the Exchaguer, the Commonwealth Secretary and the Minister of State for Foreign inflairs, to consider in the light of the discussion, the appropriate form of a public statement regarding the United States contribution.
- (2) Invited the Winister of State for Foreign Affeirs, in consultation with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Commonwealth Secretary and the Defence Secretary, to revise the Graft telegran to HM Ambessador at Washington on the lines agreed in discussion.

I. ACTION PREVIOUSLY TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

- 1. In 1964, the Special Committee adopted conclusions and recommendations concerning Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena. The three Territories were considered at two meetings in 1966 by the Special Committee, which also had before it the report of Sub-Committee I concerning these Territories. At the second of the two meetings, the Special Committee adopted the report without objection and endorsed the conclusions and recommendations contained therein.
- 2. In these conclusions and recommendations, the Sub-Committee stated that the administering Power had failed to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and expressed regret at the slow pace of political development in the three Territories. In particular, it noted that the complicated electoral arrangements devised for Mauritius had apparently been the subject of great controversy between the various groups and political parties, and that the people of Seychelles were still deprived of the right of universal adult suffrage. The Sub-Committee therefore recommended that the Special Committee should reaffirm the inalienable right of the peoples of the three Territories to self-determination and independence; that they should be allowed to exercise their right of self-determination without delay; that any constitutional changes should be left to these peoples themselves; and that free elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage should be conducted in these Territories as soon as possible with a view to the formation of responsible governments to which all power could be transferred.
- 5. Taking into account the creation of the British Indian Ocean Territory, composed of islands detached from Mauritius and Seychelles, and the reported activation of a plan to establish military bases in the three Territories, the Sub-Committee recommended that the administering Power should be called upon to respect the territorial integrity of Mauritius and Seychelles and to refrain from using all three Territories for military purposes, in fulfilment of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. The Sub-Committee further recommended that the Special Committee should urge the Assembly to state categorically that any bilateral agreements concluded between the administering Power and other Powers affecting the sovereignty and fundamental rights of these Territories should not be recognized as valid.

- 4. Concluding that the economies of the Territories were characterized by diminishing revenue, increasing unemployment and consequently a declining standard of living, and that foreign companies continued to exploit the Territories without regard to their true interests, the Sub-Committee recommended that the administering Power should be called upon to preserve the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of their national wealth and resources, as well as to take effective measures for diversifying the economies of the Territories.
- 5. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly adopted two resolutions, one concerning Mauritius (resolution 2066 (XX) of 16 December 1965) and the other concerning twenty-six Territories, including Seychelles and St. Helena (resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965). At its twenty-first session, it adopted resolution 2232 (XXI) on 20 December 1966 concerning twenty-five Territories, including Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena. The resolution called upon the administering Powers to implement without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. It reiterated the Assembly's declaration that any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and territorial integrity of colonial Territories and the establishment of military bases and installations in these Territories was incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It urged the administering Powers to allow visiting missions to visit the Territories and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. It decided that the United Nations should render all help to the peoples of the Territories in their efforts freely to decide their future status. Finally, it requested the Special Committee to pay special attention to the Territories and to report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its twenty-second session.

II. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES 3/

A. MAURITIUS

General

- 6. The Territory of Mauritius consists of the island of Mauritius and its dependencies, Rodrigues, Agalega and the Cargados Carajos. The island of Mauritius lies in the western Indian Ocean, about 500 miles east of Madagascar. Rodrigues, the main dependency, lies a further 350 miles to the east, the Cargados Carajos 250 miles and Agalega 850 miles to the north. Situated 1,200 miles north-east of Mauritius is the Chagos Archipelago, which according to the administering Power, is no longer part of Mauritius and is included in the "British Indian Ocean Territory".
- 7. The island of Mauritius is of volcanic origin; its total area is approximately 720 square miles. The northern part of the island is a flat plain rising to a fertile central plateau. There are several small chains of mountains, the principal peaks reaching about 2,700 feet. There are numerous short, swift rivers with waterfalls, some of them used to generate hydro-electric power. Rodrigues, a mountainous island of volcanic origin, covers an area of about 40 square miles. All the islands of Agalega and the Cargados Carajos are coral islands with an area of approximately 27.5 square miles.
- 8. The estimated population of Mauritius at the end of 1965, excluding the dependencies, was 751,421 (compared with 733,605 at the end of 1964) divided into a general population comprising Europeans, mainly French, Africans and persons of mixed origin, 220,093; Indo-Mauritians, made up of immigrants from the Indian sub-continent and their descendants, 506,552 (of whom 383,542 were Hindus and 123,010 Muslims); and Chinese consisting of immigrants from China and their descendants, 24,776. Latest estimates (January 1967) are that the population will rise to about 800,000 by the end of 1967.

Section II of this working paper is based on: (a) information collected by the Secretariat from published sources; and (b) information transmitted under Article 73 e by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 December 1965.

9. The Territory, which is already very densely populated, is beset with a rapid growth of population resulting in a reduction of living standards among certain sections of the people and an increasing level of unemployment.

Constitution and Government

- 10. Under the Mauritius (Constitution) Order, 1964, the Government of the Colony of Mauritius is vested in a Governor, with a Council of Ministers and a Legislative Assembly. The Council of Ministers consists of the Premier and Minister of Finance, the Chief Secretary and not less than ten and not more than thirteen other ministers appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Premier from among the elected or nominated members of the Legislative Assembly. The Governor appoints to the office of Premier the member of the Legislative Assembly who appears to him likely to command the support of the majority of members. The Council is the principal instrument of policy and, with certain exceptions, the Governor is obliged to consult it in the exercise of his functions. The Legislative Assembly consists of the Chief Secretary, forty elected members and up to fifteen other members nominated by the Governor.
- 11. The status of the political parties in the Legislative Assembly has remained the same since October 1965 general elections: Mauritius Labour Party (MLP), which represents mainly the Indo-Mauritian and Creole (Afro-European) communities, 19; Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate (PMSD), which traditionally represented the Franco-Mauritian land-owning class and the Creole middle class, and which now claims to draw support from all communities, 8; Independent Forward Bloc (IFB), which is to the left of the MLP, 7; Muslim Committee of Action (MCA), which has the support of a substantial proportion of Muslims, 4; and independent, 2. \(\) 12. The Government formed by Sir Seenoosagur Ramgoolam, leader of the MLP, is a coalition composed of all the parties represented in the Assembly, with the exception of the FMSD.

Recent constitutional developments

13. As previously noted by the Special Committee, $\frac{4}{}$ a Constitutional Conference attended by representatives of all the parties in the Mauritius Legislature was held in London from 7 to 24 September 1965. The main point at issue was whether the Territory should aim at independence or association with the United Kingdom. The MLP and the IFB advocated independence, and the MCA was also prepared to support independence, subject to certain electoral safeguards for the Muslim community. On the other hand, the PMSD favoured a continuing link with the United Kingdom. At the end of the conference, the Secretary of State for the Colonies announced the decision that Mauritius should go forward to full independence subject to an affirmative resolution passed by a simple majority of the new Assembly after elections and a period of six months' full internal self-government. He also hoped that the necessary processes could be completed before the end of 1966. 14. In January 1966, an electoral commission, with Sir Harold Banwell as chairman, visited Mauritius to formulate an electoral system and the method of allocating seats in the Legislature. The report $\frac{5}{}$ was published on 13 June 1966 and accepted by the parties participating in the present Government and the Opposition PMSD after certain amendments to the recommendations of the report had been made, following the visit of Mr. John Stonehouse, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, to Mauritius between 16 June and 4 July 1966.

- 15. Under the electoral arrangements now accepted by the four main parties, sixty members will be returned for the island of Mauritius by block voting (each elector being obliged to cast three votes) in twenty three-member constituencies, and two members returned for Rodrigues (the principal dependency of Mauritius) by block voting in a single constituency. The members elected for Rodrigues will also represent the interests of the two lesser dependencies, namely, Cargados Carajos and Agalega.
- 16. In addition, eight specially elected members will be returned from among unsuccessful candidates who have made the best showing in the elections. The first four of these seats will go, irrespective of party, to the "best losers" of whichever communities are under-represented in the Legislative Assembly after the constituency elections. The remaining four seats will be allocated on the basis of party and community. Parties or party alliances will be permitted to qualify for the "best loser" seats if registered with the Electoral Commissioner before nomination day.

17. The Constitution of Mauritius set out in the Mauritius Constitution Order, 1966, which was made on 21 December 1966, incorporated the proposals agreed upon at the 1965 constitutional conference, as well as the subsequent agreement on electoral arrangements. The Order in Council provides that the new Constitution will come into effect on a date to be appointed by the Governor. It also provides that the provision for the appointment of an ombudsman may be brought into effect at a later date from the generality of the other constitutional proposals.

Election arrangements

- 18. Subject to certain exceptions, such as convicted criminals and the insane, all Commonwealth citizens satisfying a two-year residence requirement who have attained the age of 21 years are qualified to register as electors. New registers of electors were prepared in 1966. They were published on 23 January 1967 and brought into force the following day. The total numbers on the new registers are 307,908 for Mauritius plus 7,876 in Rodrigues, making a combined total of 315,784. Four Commonwealth observers (with Sir Colin MacGregor of Jamaica as chairman) were appointed to observe the various processes involved in compiling the new registers. Three of the members arrived in Mauritius on 5 September 1966 and one or more member was present from then until 28 November.
- 19. Discussions took place in London in December 1966 between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Premier of Mauritius about the date for the forthcoming general elections in the Territory. In a statement published on 21 December 1966, the Commonwealth Office said that the United Kingdom Government's view presented during the discussions was that it was most desirable that elections should be held at the earliest practicable time, bearing in mind that at the 1965 Constitutional Conference, the then Secretary of State had hoped that Mauritius could become independent before the end of 1966. Neither the United Kingdom Government nor the Government of Mauritius could avoid the subsequent delays, but the completion of the register of electors in the relatively near future would enable elections to be held in 1967.

20. The Commonwealth Office also said that the Secretary of State had expressed the hope that the Premier would share his wish to see early elections and that the Premier had confirmed that he would wish elections to be held in 1967.

Recent political developments

- 21. Following the issuance of the report of the Banwell Commission, the three parties participating in the present Government organized a common front, the Pro-Independence Front, under the leadership of the Premier in protest against the Commission's proposals for electoral arrangements. Subsequently, the Front was reported to have been maintained for the forthcoming general elections.
 22. On 5 September 1966, Mr. G. Duval, who later became the leader of the Opposition PMSD, was reported to have said that two important election issues were the constitutional future of the Territory and the inability of the Government to put the economy on a sound basis or to look after the destitute.
- 23. On the same day, Mr. Duval started a movement of passive resistance in Mauritius. Following the reported refusal by the Government to pay them the same amount of relief aid allocated to certain other categories of unemployed workers, some 200 unemployed licensees of the urban administration demonstrated in Curepipe and were arrested for the obstruction of traffic. Later, the Government took action to settle the issue in dispute.

24. At the end of October 1966, over 100 unemployed persons rejected an offer of work on sugar estates, alleging political discrimination. They demonstrated at various places between Mahébourg and Curepipe, culminating in the arrest of 105 persons on 29 October for obstructing the highway. On 4 November, they were tried and found guilty, but were discharged from prison after having received a warning from the Court of Curepipe.

External relations

25. During a visit to the United States of America early in December 1966, the Premier of Mauritius said that his Government was seeking to improve relations between the two countries, to raise the price of the two principal products of Mauritius, sugar and tea, as well as to secure aid for creating secondary industries, increasing the production of foodstuffs, notably rice and flour, establishing a new aerial link with Africa, Europe and the United States, reducing population pressure and unemployment, and setting up a university. After discussions with the representatives of the United States Government and various private organizations, he expressed the hope that they would help Mauritius in finding solutions to many of its problems.

"British Indian Ocean Territory"

26. Reference is made in the last report of the Special Committee 6/2 to the "British Indian Ocean Territory" which comprises certain islands formerly administered by the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles, and which was created in 1965 for the construction of defence facilities by the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States. As compensation for the transfer of these islands to the new Colony, the United Kingdom Government paid £3 million to Mauritius in March 1966 with no conditions attached, and will build an international airfield for Seychelles. On 16 November 1966, the Secretary of State for Defence stated in reply to a question in the United Kingdom House of Commons that no plan had been made for the creation of military bases in the "British Indian Ocean Territory". Thus he could not give any figure for the cost of such a scheme.

Economic conditions

- 27. Mauritius is primarily an agricultural country. In 1960, it suffered a severe economic setback brought about by two disastrous cyclones. Subsequently, the economy made a good recovery, reaching a peak in 1963, which saw a bumper sugar crop combined with higher sugar prices. If these two years are not taken into account, the gross national product showed a steady growth, from Rs.681 million in 1959 to Rs.799 million in 1965. During this period, the population increased from 637,000 to 751,000. There was a slight downward trend in per capita income and a rise in the level of unemployment.
- 28. In 1965, sugar was still the mainstay of the economy. Tea had become the second most important export product. In acres, the total area of land under cultivation comprised: sugar, 214,400; tea, 6,600; tobacco, 1,000; aloe fib 900; foodcrops, vegetables and fruits, 10,000.

29. In September 1966, the Chamber of Agriculture of Mauritius estimated st output for the full year at about 575,000 metric tons, representing a consided decrease from 1965, when a total of 665,000 metric tons had been produced. "Denise" and drought accounted for the decline in output.

30. Sugar is disposed of primarily in accordance with the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, which has been renewed until 1974. Under the Agreement, Mauritin exports a quota (380,000 tons per annum) to the United Kingdom at a negotial price (£47.10s a ton in 1966-68). In addition, Mauritius may export to Commonwealth preferential markets (in fact the United Kingdom and Canada) a agreed quota each year. The remainder of the sugar production is sold to no Commonwealth countries at the world free market price, which in 1966 was substantially below the negotiated price. Exports of sugar to the United K the Territory's principal customer, in the first ten months of the year tot 307,786 tons (Rs.208.6 million), an increase of 59,350 tons (Rs.42.5 million the 1965 period. However, it was estimated that the gross income of the su industry might be moderately lower in 1966 than in the preceding year, when 569,400 tons of sugar (Rs.290.5 million) were exported.

31. Manufacturing is the second largest sector of the economy. The United Central Office of Information reported in October 1966 that since 1963, nea fifty new secondary industries had been introduced on a small scale in the Territory. As previously noted, between the number of such industries established years 1963 to 1965 was eight, eleven and twenty-five respectively.

32. Between the first and second quarter of 1966, imports increased from Rs.80.4 million to Rs.82.9 million, while exports decreased from Rs.56.7 mito Rs.6.3 million. No significant changes occurred in the structure of imput exports of sugar in the first quarter were Rs.47.3 million and in the quarter Rs.0.5 million. The third quarter figure was Rs.134.6 million, mal total for the first nine months of Rs.182.4 million. As in the past, trade conducted mainly with the United Kingdom, which received 73 per cent of the Territory's exports and provided 23 per cent of its imports in the first half of 1966.

- 33. In July 1966, the Government decided to increase both direct and indirect taxes in order to balance its budget.
- 34. Capital expenditure under the 1966-70 Development Programme will be Rs.340 million and the fund will be allocated as follows: agriculture and industry, Rs.130 million; infra-structure, Rs.99 million; social services, Rs.82 million; administration, Rs.28 million; Rodrigues, Rs.1 million.
- 35. Premier Ramgoolam said in a recent address that an important economic problem for the Territory was that the price of sugar could not be stabilized at a remunerative level.
- 36. The Premier said that progress in the diversification of the Territory's economy had been slow. The Territory was putting 1,000 acres under tea annually, and it was the intention of the Government to extend this by a further 15,000 acres. The sugar industry had undertaken to provide capital out of its surplus for the erection of seven more tea factories. Businessmen were being encouraged to invest in Mauritius, and in recent years a number of light industries had been established. Industrial expansion had been facilitated by the setting up of the Development Bank of Mauritius, the advisory National Development Council and a marketing board. An East African Economic Community was under discussion, and if this were to materialize it would give further encouragement to many smaller industries.
- 37. While aware that conditions such as the rapid rise in population, the scarcity of local capital and the paucity of technological know-how had limited economic growth, the Premier nevertheless asserted that the Territory enjoyed a stability and prosperity unknown before in its history through a better distribution of the national income. This was being achieved by a planned economy and a regulated fiscal policy. Recurrent and developmental annual expenditures totalled approximately over £22 million. The sum of £6 million was spent annually on the development programme alone, and 48 per cent of this was financed from local resources. Mauritius was a viable country, which had never needed a grant-in-aid to balance its budget.

- 38. In December 1966 the Premier made a visit to the United States, the main purpose of which was to seek aid to tackle the economic and social problems confronting the Territory (see paragraph 25 above).
- 39. On 20 December 1966, Mr. John Stonehouse, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, stated in reply to a question in the United Kingdom House of Commons that during the period 1961-66, the United Kingdom had provided Mauritius with financial aid totalling £8.1 million, in addition to the compensation of £3 million paid for the inclusion of certain of its islands in the "British Indian Ocean Territory", and to a £2 million loan raised by the Government of Mauritius on the London market-For the period 1965-68, total Colonial Development and Welfare grants and loan assistance given or envisaged amounted to £4.4 million. Aid to Mauritius after 31 March 1968 would depend on the total resources the United Kingdom could make available for overseas aid at the time and the Territory's needs in relation to those of other recipients of British aid.
- 40. In response to another question, Mr. Stonehouse stated that in order to combat chronic, widespread unemployment in Mauritius, his Government was examining various ways by which the Territory's economy could be diversified. But he added that the economy was almost completely dependent on sugar and that there were problems in arranging for any new industrial development. These questions were being studied.

Social conditions

41. Labour. In recent years, the economy has not expanded fast enough to provide work for all the new entrants into the labour force. Between mid-1962 and mid-1965 the annual increase in the working-age population and unemployment was estimated at about 6,500 and over 4,000 respectively. During the period, the number registered as unemployed rose by 4,700 and that on relief work by 9,050, making a total of 13,750.

42. On 28 April 1966, the Government published the first of its bi-annual surveys of employment and earnings in large establishments. 2/ The main purpose of these surveys was not to find out figures of total employment but to provide a continuou series of comparable data which would show changes in employment from year to year, from one part of the year to another and between the various sectors of the economy. The survey covered 822 establishments, which in April 1966 employed 119,270 workers (including 34,210 on monthly rates of pay and 85,060 on daily rates of pay). Agriculture accounted for 55,200 (including 51,870 employed by the sugar industry), services 45,850, manufacturing 6,850, transport, storage and communications 4,100, commerce 2,960, construction 2,730, electricity 1,310, mining and quarrying 160, and others, 110. The average monthly rates of pay ranged from Rs. 273 for agricultural workers to Rs. 500 for electricians. The average daily rates of pay ranged from Rs. 3.2 for miners to Rs. 8.8 for those engaged in miscellaneous activities.

- 43. In 1965, there were seventy-nine associations of employees (one more than in 1964), with a membership of 48,349 (120 more than in 1964). There were ten trade disputes involving 1,660 workers and resulting in a loss of 3,860 man-days. The main cause of these disputes was dissatisfaction with conditions of employment. 44. Labour relations in the sugar industry formed a subject of discussion in the Legislative Assembly on 29 November 1966. A member of the Assembly, Mr. J.N. Roy, introduced a motion which would have the Assembly express the view that the widespread and defiant opposition to Indo-Mauritian workers in the sugar industry, if not checked by legislation, threatened to wreck the industry.
- 45. Commenting on the motion, another member of the Assembly, Mr. Jomadar, who was formerly the Minister of Labour, stated that it was very opportune and that a section of workers in the sugar industry was the victim of injustice. Having made an appeal for eliminating all forms of discrimination and injustice, he proposed an amendment to the motion, which was then adopted unanimously.
- 46. Under this amendment, the Assembly would express the view that a tripartite standing committee be set up by the Government in co-operation with employers and employees in the sugar industry for the discussion of all matters of concern either to employers or employees or which could adversely affect the good relations between them or the efficiency of the industry. These would include steps to ensure equality of opportunity in recruitment and promotion, and especially the discussion and disposal of possible complaints of discrimination against any category of workers or employees for suspected political affiliation or for any other cause.
- 47. The Premier of Mauritius said in a recent address that the main problems confronting the Territory today were the rapid rise in population and widespread unemployment. For many years, the government machinery had been geared to tackle these problems at many levels of administration. However, time had been lost in the beginning because some people had opposed population control on religious grounds, but a change of attitude had come about. With the assistance of the Government and the International Planned Parenthood Federation, two voluntary associations were performing good work both in the urban and rural areas. Mauritius had also been promised considerable aid from the Swedish Government. 48. As to unemployment, the Premier stated, the Government was engaged actively in long-term development of the Territory and pursued a rationalized policy of emigration. It hoped to mobilize all local resources for the creation of more work and wealth. It had also decided not to place an embargo on the export of capital in order to attract foreign investors to Mauritius. But any Mauritian emigrating overseas was only allowed to remove his capital from the country over a number of years. At present, certain labour-intensive projects including tea, textiles and edible oils were being undertaken, which would provide employment for a large number of people. By 1970, it was hoped to provide work for most of the labour force. 49. Public health. There are three systems of providing medical services in Mauritius, of which the largest is the government medical services, administered by the Ministry of Health. Other medical services are provided by the sugar estates for their employees, as required by the Labour Ordinance, while maternity and child welfare services are provided partly by the Government and partly by a voluntary body - the Maternity and Child Welfare Society. 50. Recently, some important changes have occurred in these systems. Government expenditure on medical and health services in the financial year 1964-65 was Rs. 19.7 million (an increase of Rs. 0.5 million over the previous year), or about 9.6 per cent of the Territory's total expenditure. In 1965, there were 137 government and 74 private physicians (compared with 118 and 65 respectively in the previous year). There was, thus, one physician for every 3,400 persons. A total of twenty-four hospitals was maintained by the sugar estates, representing a reduction of one from the previous year. The number of beds available for in-patients in the Territory decreased by fifteen to 3,339 and that of general beds by forty-five to 2,706, amounting to a proportion of one general bed per 51. During 1966, the Government began to construct a 600-bed hospital at Pamplemousses, the total cost of which was estimated at £2.1 million. On 25 November 1966, the United Kingdom Ministry of Overseas Development announced that Colonial Development and Welfare allocations totalling £1.4 million had been made available towards this project. Early in 1967 the Ministry provided a gynaecologist to give instruction to medical, nursing and other staff in family planning work and a medical administrator to work in the Mauritius Ministry of Health. The Ministry is also supplying equipment to the value of approximately £4,000 for thirteen clinics. On 20 December 1966, Mr. Stonehouse said in reply to a question in the United Kingdom House of Commons that in Mauritius, the number of family planning clinics had recently been increased from 98 to 124 and that the programme was very successful.

Educational conditions

^{53.} In 1965, the Government opened seven new primary schools, extended one secondary school and established the John Kennedy College. This college provides full-time training in technical and commercial subjects and also a variety of part-time and evening courses. Full-time, post-secondary education is provided by the Teachers' Training College and the College of Agriculture. The latter is managed by the Department of Agriculture and most of its diplomats enter the sugar industry.

During the year, there were over 1,200 students following full-time courses institutions of higher education overseas.

54. In December 1965, the University of Mauritius (Provisional Council) On became law. The United Kingdom Government has made an initial pledge of Rs. 3 million from Colonial Development and Welfare funds to finance a deve plan for the University. Dr. S.J. Hale of the University of Edinburgh has appointed Vice-Chancellor. The Premier of Mauritius said in a recent addresseps were being taken towards the establishment of the University where st would be taught and trained in technology and science.

55. Government expenditure on education in the financial year 1964-65 total Rs. 28.9 million (an increase of Rs. 0.6 million over the previous year), cross. 26 million was recurrent and Rs. 2.9 million capital expenditure. B. SEYCHELLES

General

56. As from 8 November 1965, when three of its islands were included in the "British Indian Ocean Territory", the Territory of Seychelles has comprised eighty-nine islands situated in the western Indian Ocean approximately 1,000 miles east of the Kenya coast. The islands, with a land area of some eighty-nine square miles, fall into two groups of entirely different geological formation, thirty-two being granite and the rest coral. The granite islands are predominantly mountainous. In some of them and particularly in Mahé, the largest island, which has an area of about 55.5 square miles, a narrow coastal belt of level land surrounds the granitic mountain massif, which rises steeply to an elevation, at Morne Seychellois, the highest peak, of almost 3,000 feet. The coral islands are flat, elevated coral reefs at different stages of formation. 57. Most of the inhabitants of the Seychelles are descended from the early French and African settlers. Early in 1966, the population of Seychelles was estimated to be about 48,000 (compared with 47,400 at the end of June 1965), nearly all of whom lived in the granitic island group. Three quarters of the Territory's population lives on Mahé, and most of the remainder on Praslin, La Digue and Silhouette. There are very few permanent residents on the coral islands. 58. The present population is increasing at a rate believed to be in excess of 3 per cent per annum. If this rate is maintained, the population will double in less than twenty-three years. The rapid growth of population has slowed down the rise in living standards among certain sections of the people, and reduced employment opportunities.

Constitution and Government

59. The Government of the Colony of Seychelles consists of a Governor, a Legislative Council and an Executive Council. The Governor is empowered to enact laws with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, subject to the retention by the Crown of the power to disallow or refuse consent.

60. Under a 1960 Order in Council, the Legislative Council consists of the Governor, as president, four ex officio members (the Colonial Secretary, Attorney-General, Administrative Secretary and Financial Secretary), five elected and three nominated members, of whom at least one must be an unofficial member. General elections, on a broad franchise based on a simple literacy test, must take place every four years. The last elections were held in July 1963.
61. The Executive Council consists of the Governor, who presides, four ex officio members and such other persons, at least one of whom must be an unofficial member, as the Governor may from time to time appoint. The composition of the present Executive Council is identical with that of the Legislative Council.

Recent political and constitutional developments

- 62. At the 1963 elections, all except one of the five elected seats in the Legislative Council were contested to some extent on party lines between candidates broadly supported either by the long-established Seychelles Taxpayers and Producers Association, representing European planters! interests, or the newly formed Seychelles Islands United Farty, drawing its support mainly from the middle and working classes. Both parties were able to claim two seats, and the remaining seat went to an independent candidate claiming support from both.
- 63. In 1964, the Seychelles Islands United Party faded out and two new parties emerged, namely, the Seychelles Democratic Party (SDP) led by Mr. J.R. Mancham and the Seychelles People's United Party (SFUP) led by Mr. F.A. René. About the same time the Seychelles Taxpayers and Producers Association was reorganized into an estensibly non-political Seychelles Farmers' Association designed to promote and defend the interests of the agricultural community.
- 64. The main differences between the two parties were reported by Sir Colville Deverell (see below) to be in the accent they placed on the speed of constitutional evolution, and the nature of the ultimate status of Seychelles after a period of self-government. Mr. Mancham, the leader of SDP, advocated a cautious advance and an ultimate relationship with the United Kingdom as close as possible to integration, while Mr. René, the leader of SFUP, initially advocated a rapid, if not immediate, advance to self-government and the early attainment of a status of complete independence.

schools, two of which provided all-age education, three secondary schools and one selective secondary school. In 1965, there were sixty full-time (fifty-eight in 1964) and six part-time (three in 1964) teachers. Selected young teachers sent to the United Kingdom to follow a three-year course leading to a certific in education conferred by the Ministry of Education. More experienced teacher are also sent there for further training. In 1965, a senior teacher departed for a year's course. The expenditure on educational services during the year estimated at £24,561 (an increase of £1,666 over the previous year), or 10.6 per cent of the Territory's total expenditure.

III. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

122. The Special Committee considered Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 535th to 539th meetings held away from Headquarters, between 15 and 19 June 1967. The Special Committee had before it the report of Sub-Committee I concerning these Territories (A/AC.109/L.398), which is annexed hereto.

A. Written petitions and hearings

123. The Special Committee had before it a written petition concerning Mauritius from Mr. A.H. Dorghoty, Second Secretary, Mauritius People's Progressive Party (MPPP) (A/AC.109/PET.689). It heard a petitioner concerning that Territory, Mr. T: Sibsurun, Secretary-General, MPPP, accompanied by Mr. Dorghoty. 124. Mr. Sibsurun (MPPP) recalled that more than fourteen months had elapsed since the Special Committee's meeting at which certain resolutions and recommendations had been adopted and it had been decided that the inalienable right of the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to self-determination, in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, should be reaffirmed. The most important of the recommendations were those to the effect that the administering Power should be urged to allow the population of the three Territories to exercise their right of self-determination without delay, constitutional changes being left to the people of the Territories themselves who alone had the right to decide on the form of government they wished to adopt; that free elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage should be conducted as soon as possible; and that the administering Fower should be called upon to respect the islands' territorial integrity and ensure that they were not used for military

125. The United Kingdom Government had not made the slightest effort to accede to the people's demands. In March 1966, he had stressed to the Special Committee the prevalence of bribery and corruption by the imperialists during the pre-election period. Under Mauritian law, a candidate was allowed to spend up to about Rs.5,000 on his electoral campaign but in most cases vast sums were lavished on canvassing votes, and he had pointed out that the Government should take steps to ensure that the law was respected. The general election was to be held in September 1967 and nothing had yet been done by the Government to enforce such law. History was obviously repeating itself and the poor people who were askin for nothing more than their rudimentary rights were being exploited.

^{14/} This section includes those portions of the statements made on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena in the Special Committee which relate to the question in general; those portions which refer specifically to the draft resolution are included in section IV. It should be noted that additional comments on the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena were contained in the statements made at the opening of the Special Committee's meetings at Kinshasa, Kitwe and Dar es Salaam. These statements are included in Chapter II of the Special Committee's report (A/6700 (Part II)).

126. He had asked at the same time that supervisors from African and Asian countries should be sent to conduct the general election but, in September 136 before the United Nations had had time to appoint them, the United Kingdom is dispatched observers from Commonwealth countries to supervise the registration voters and the general election. It was evident that they would only be able observe and could not investigate the true situation.

127. At the International Conference against War Danger, Military Pacts and Atomic Weapons and Colonialism, resolutions had been adopted calling for immand unconditional independence for Mauritius, with an immediate general electron and moral, material, technical and financial support for a major propagands campaign to rid Chagos Island of the nuclear military bases installed by the United Kingdom and the United States.

128. In February 1967, at its eighth session, the Council of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization, meeting at Nicosia, had adopted a resolution on Masking that supervisors should be sent to conduct the general election which lead to complete and unconditional independence for the island, that the Takingdom and United States system of direct telecommunications, which had be transferred from Trincomalee to Vaccas, should be dismantled, and that more support, and material, technical and financial aid should be provided in the remove the United Kingdom and United States base on Chagos Island.

129. He had intended to ask the United Kingdom representative certain querbut unfortunately he was not there to reply. It would have been interest know why the United Kingdom had decided to buy, without the consent of the Mauritian people, what it considered to be its own territory; why the re-Government had connived with the United Kingdom to deprive Mauritius of a dependencies; why the United Kingdom had always rejected, without explan-all petitions for the holding of a referendum on the military bases. It was obvious that the United Kingdom wanted to grant the island independence, while maintaining a nuclear base on Mauritian soil. The Mauritians had always been a peace-loving people, had never been involved in any world war and did not want their innocent country blasted by a nuclear bomb. In the event of a third world war, Mauritius wished to remain neutral. No country could be truly independent if it remained linked with the great Powers, and the independence obtained years before by their African, Arab and Hindu brothers would also turn out to be illusory. He hoped the world would not witness such injustice without reacting against it. 130. The imperialists presented themselves as champions of human rights and democracy, yet challenged their subject peoples' rights to social, political and economic justice. The colonial countries would not flinch before the imperialists' impressive might and would demand their rudimentary rights. 131. The Special Committee should exercise its power and compel the United Kingdom and the United States to respect its decisions and resolutions. The nuclear base was a direct threat to Africa, Asia and the Middle East and to world peace. United Kingdom and United States experts were already in Mauritius putting the finishing touches to the Chagos Island base. Time was short; the general election was to be held on 17 September 1967 and he hoped the other countries would not turn a deaf ear to Mauritius' justified pleas. 132. The reactionary Government had done nothing for the country; it had introduced illegal and exorbitant taxes to pay for the extension of Plaisance airport to enable it to accommodate the latest jet aircraft, to enable the Government to pursue its neo-colonialist policy after independence and to erect an imperialist bastion in the Indian Ocean to check the advance of socialism in Africa. It was not surprising, therefore, that without the consent of the people, the same reactionary Government was supporting Israel in its war of aggression against the Arab States. He wondered how long the people of Mauritius were to be ignored. 133. The people had held a grand mass rally on world peace, organized by MPPP, on 11 June 1967, and had urged Prime Minister Wilson to reconsider the question of the Chagos Island base and accede to their demand that a referendum should be held on the matter, pointing out that they wanted to remain neutral in the event of a third world war.

134. In conclusion, he appealed to the Special Committee to ensure that the recommendations of the above-mentioned conferences were implemented. 135. In reply to questions concerning his Party's membership, strength and activities to date, the petitioner stated that MPPP had been formed in 1963 after the last general elections and had been affiliated with the Afro-Asian People's Solidarity Committee at the Moshi Conference. The other parties were the Mauritian Social Democratic Party, the Mauritius Labour Party, the Independent Forward Bloc and the Muslim Committee of Action. A new Party, the Hindu Congress, had been formed in 1966. MPPP was the only political party to have its own office which were open every day, and a register of members. The other parties had no membership lists and only opened their offices for the election campaign. MPPP h about 50,000 supporters out of a total population of 786,000 and sympathizers among the working class. It would present candidates for the first time at the forthcoming elections. 136. Although not represented in Parliament, MPPP had been actively opposing the Government and holding daily meetings throughout the country to explain to the people the gravity of the situation created by the military bases on the island. 137. When invited to London to discuss the new Constitution, the Mauritian Social Democrat Party, which was in favour of association with the United Kingdom, had dissociated itself from the coalition Government because the other parties represented wanted independence, although they were also in favour of retaining the military bases. In 1965, the Government had sold Chagos Island for £3 millia to the United Kingdom, which, in conjunction with the United States, was building a military base on it. The United Kingdom now denied buying the island outright. saying that the money had merely been given as compensation. Dep 138. MPPP attended not only the meetings of the Special Committee but also international conferences throughout the world, for instance, the New Delhi Conference on War Danger in November 1966 and the Afro-Asian Council in Cyprus if February 1966. On 11 June 1967, it had asked the Mauritian people to attend a mass rally in favour of peace, especially in Viet-Nam, the dismantling of the military base and unconditional independence for their country. 139. Asked to supply more details concerning the size, number and type of bases and the use made of them, the petitioner regretted that he was unable to state exact size of the bases. The base at Vacoas was used to house the direct telecommunications system which had been transferred from Trincomalee. The United States Government was providing funds to enlarge Plaisance airport so that jet aircraft could land there. The United Kingdom had always realized the strategic importance of Mauritius; it had taken the bases from France and had granted independence to the country only on condition that it could continue to use the key bases in the Indian Ocean. During the past year the United States Air Force had been using Plaisance airport continuously. It had also been reported in the newspapers and confirmed by the United Kingdom itself that the United Kingdom and United States navies would continue to use the naval bases in Mauritius. 140. The petitioner was asked whether or not the administering Power was implementing the United Nations decisions, and whether he was in a position to give details regarding the establishment of a base by the United Kingdom and the United States on Mauritius. Replying, he stated that the United Kingdom had not implemented the 1966 resolution any more than it had many others adopted by the United Nations. The construction of the military bases was well advanced under the supervision of experts from the United Kingdom and United States, who were to stay until the completion of the bases. 141. In reply to a further question, the petitioner said that the election was to be held on 17 September 1967. The Prime Minister, fearing trouble in a multiracial country, had asked the United Kingdom to send troops as well as observers to supervise the general election. The opposition was divided into too many small parties and did not present a united front. Although all were in favour of complete independence, some were willing to retain the military bases, whereas MPPP demanded that independence should be unconditional. The Mauritian Social Democrat Party, on the other hand, wanted a continued association with the United Kingdom.

B. General statements

142. At the 536th meeting, the Chairman of Sub-Committee I (the representative of Ethiopia), presenting the Sub-Committee's report on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, (see annex) said that the Sub-Committee had considered the situation in these Territories during the period 5 April to 10 May 1967. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the United Kingdom representative had participated in the Sub-Committee's consideration of the three Territories.

143. The Sub-Committee had been guided by paragraph 16 of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, which requested the Special Committee "to pay particular attention to the small Territories and to recommend to the General Assembly the most appropriate methods and also the steps to be taken to enable the populations of those Territories to exercise fully the right to self-determination and independence". The Sub-Committee had also taken into account paragraph 15 of the resolution which invited the Special Committee "whenever it considers it appropriate to recommend a deadline for the accession to independent to each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people and the provisions of the Declaration". Further, the Sub-Committee was aware that, as recognized by the Special Committee in paragraph 322 of chapter I of its 1966 report (A/6300 (Fart I)) "their small size and population as well as their limited resources presented peculiar problems". However, the Sub-Committee was firmly of the opin that the provisions of the Declaration were applicable to those Territories, and had examined the situation there within that context.

144. The report of the Sub-Committee consisted of four chapters. The Chairman drew special attention to the conclusions and recommendations of the report, contained in paragraphs 124 to 129 and paragraphs 130 to 139, respectively. The report had been adopted by the Sub-Committee at its 39th meeting on 10 May 1967. The representative of Finland had stated that since certain parts of the conclusions and the recommendations were not in accord with and did not reflect the views expressed by his delegation, it could not support all the conclusions and recommendations.

145. The representative of India said that the Indian delegation had carefully studied the valuable and instructive report of Sub-Committee I. It unreservedly supported its conclusions and recommendations and congratulated the Sub-Committe 146. His delegation deeply regretted the slow progress towards the self-determination and independence of the Territories in question. In spite of repeated appeals, the administering Power had not taken steps to expedite decolonization. Progress in the Seychelles and St. Helena had been particularly slow. He hoped that the United Kingdom Government would respect the people's wishes and grant them the political status of their choice without further delay 147. The United Kingdom Government's policy with regard to Mauritius was to delay independence as much as possible. For several years much had been heard of impending independence, but the United Kingdom Government had found one pretext.

another to postpone the inevitable, giving the impression that it found parting it that rich colony extremely difficult. The Constitutional Conference had been ha as early as September 1965, yet the country was not expected to become dependent until about the middle of 1968. That long interval seemed totally mustified. Considerable time had been wasted by the appointment of the Banwell mission, whose recommendations had been unacceptable to the Mauritian political arties. They had had to be modified substantially following Mr. Stonehouse's tit, thus wasting more than six months. The electoral system under the modified well proposals seemed unduly complicated; if, however, it was acceptable to the litical parties in the island, his delegation would respect it, its only desire ing that the people of Mauritius should become independent without further delay. M. The independence of Mauritius was essential not only for the emotional Msfaction of its people but also to enable them to devote their energies to se their level of living. Without political independence real economic progress impossible. Colonial Powers were not interested in doing anything for the ple of their colonies that would not at the same time be in their own strategic ther interests. Mauritius provided an excellent example of that policy. It an economy almost wholly dependent on the production and export of sugar. The Med Nations had been urging the administering Power since 1964 to take effective tures to diversify the economy, but the United Kingdom Government's only response been to take some half-hearted and haphazard steps without really trying to work a well-co-ordinated programme. Its failure to develop other sectors of the nomy had resulted in shortage of capital, a downward trend in per capita income increased unemployment. The little progress that had been achieved had been mainly to the efforts of the Government of Mauritius headed by Premier Ramgoolam, was reported to have said that Mauritius was a viable country which had never ed a grant-in-aid to balance its budget. His delegation had no doubt that, the country achieved its independence, progress in the diversification of its now would be accelerated.

The administering Power in Mauritius, as in other colonies, such as Fiji, had taking advantage of the differences in the Territory in order to maintain its immant position and protect foreign vested economic interests. Fortunately, different communities had successfully resisted the administering Power's but to divide them. They had realized that their common interest lay in ridding themselves first of the colonial administration. His delegation wished Mr. Ramgoolam and his associates all the success they deserved in leading their country to independence as a unified nation.

150. His Government had been greatly perturbed at the reports of the establishment of military installations in the "British Indian Ocean Territory" that had been created artificially by detaching certain islands from Mauritius and Seychelles. That was a clear violation of General Assembly resolutions 2066 (XX) and 2232 (XXI) which asked the administering Power not to take any action that would dismember the Territory or violate its territorial integrity. Such dismemberment was also a clear violation of paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and of the United Nations Charter. The creation of the new colony also ran counter to the declared wishes of the peace-loving peoples of Africa and Asia and must be regarded as contrary to the interests of those peoples in the immediate vicinity of the military installations. In that connexion, he quoted from a statement made by the Indian Minister for Foreign Affairs in Parliament on 6 April 1967, as follows:

"The Indian Government's position has been made clear in the past and there is no change in our stand. We have subscribed to the Bandung Declaration of 1955. We have also signed the Cairo Declaration of 1964 on the subject of establishment of bases in the Indian Ocean and we stand by them.

"We have also subscribed to resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2066 (XX) of 20 December 1966 adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, dealing with this subject. Resolution 2066 (XX) 'notes with deep concern that any step by the Administering Power to detach certain islands from the territory of Mauritius for the purpose of establishment of military bases would be in contravention of resolution 1514 (XV)'. It further invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity'.

"We are opposed to the establishment of military bases in the Indian Ocean area as it might lead to an increase in tensions in this region. We hope that in the largest interest of peace, the British authorities will bear in mind our feelings and feeling of the countries in this region and desist from setting up a military base in this area."

151. The representative of Poland expressed his appreciation of the work of Sub-Committee I and, in particular, of the concise and objective manner in which its report was drafted. He also thanked the Sub-Committee's Chairman for her able presentation of the report.

152. In all three Territories, progress towards the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) had been extremely slow. Though almost seven years had elapsed since the adoption of the Declaration on decolonization, the people of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had not yet achieved the objectives sought by the United Nations, and the administering Power was still delaying the transfer of authority to the democratically elected representatives of the peoples of the three Territories.

153. As pointed out in paragraph 125 of the report, the United Kingdom, through the Governor, continued to exercise vast powers, particularly in the constitutional and legislative fields. Contrary to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), the administering Power was insisting on an even longer constitutional process in Seychelles than in Mauritius on the pretext that the people lacked political experience. In Mauritius, the elections had still not been held and the United Kingdom Government, though well aware of the people's wishes for independence, was attaching conditions to the granting of it: e.g., that there should be an interval of six months between self-government and independence, and that the demand for complete independence should be reiterated by the vote of a majority elected at the future general elections to be held under complex and controversial electoral arrangements.

154. Furthermore, the United Kingdom was openly violating the principles of the United Nations Charter and the General Assembly resolution by dismembering Mauritius and the Seychelles for military purposes, with the help of the United States. The Polish delegation fully shared the concern expressed by the Special Committee at the establishment in 1965 of a new colony - the "British Indian Ocean Territory" - and at reports that it would be used as a military base. In resolutions 2189 (XXI) and 2232 (XXI), the General Assembly reiterated its earlier declaration that any attempt to disrupt the national unity and territorial integrity of colonial Territories or to establish military bases or installations there was incompatible with the United Nations Charter and with resolution 1514 (XV). Despite the warning of the non-aligned countries at the Cairo Conference in 1964 that such military bases would create tension and would be used to bring pressure against independent States in their vicinity and against national liberation movements, the United Kingdom had refused to give any assurance that the islands detached from Mauritius and Seychelles would not be used under any circumstances for military purposes. The Polish delegation firmly endorsed paragraphs 126 and 127 of the report of the Sub-Committee and strongly believed that the attitude of the United Kingdom was incompatible with its obligations as the administering Power.

155. The data contained in the Secretariat working paper (see paragraphs 1-121 above) clearly indicated the administering Power's failure to diversify the economies of the three Territories, which were still dependent on a single crop, and, to an increasing extent, on external aid. Mauritius had to import 90 per ce of its needs for essential goods and foodstuffs. It was also clear from the document that unemployment was increasing in Mauritius and Seychelles and that the per capita income in those Territories was tending to fall.

156. In the Polish delegation's opinion, the administering Power should take vigorous measures to assist the peoples of those Territories by grants-in-aid and development programmes to diversify their economy and create employment and opportunities for the growing populations. It should likewise take steps, without further delay, to ensure that the peoples of those Territories achieved independence in the best possible conditions.

157. The representative of Bulgaria said that his delegation had studied the report very carefully and associated itself with the conclusions and recommenda He expressed his appreciation of the valuable work performed by the Sub-Committee The administering Power was continuing without restraint to use the Territory is the own requirements, to behave as its undisputed colonial master, to disregan completely the inalienable rights of its population to freedom and independence to exploit their natural resources, to dismember the Territories and to establish military bases with the participation of another great Power.

158. It was unbelievable that, seven years after the adoption of General Assen resolution 1514 (XV), the colonial Power could show such complete disregard for its provisions and for the United Nations as a whole. Bulgaria shared the concern of the neighbouring nations which considered the military bases estable on the Territories to be detrimental to their security and were demanding the dismantling of all military installations and the discontinuance of military activity.

159. The representative of Madagascar said that he had carefully studied the report of Sub-Committee I on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena. His delegation like the Sub-Committee, considered that the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) should be speedily implemented in those Territories. Indeed, it had already supported in the Committee many of the ideas and principles set forth in the Sub-Committee's report. Madagascar, in view of its geographical situation, was certainly the country which was closest to Mauritius, a fact which had enabled it to maintain normal and cordial relations with that Territory. His delegation was particularly well placed to speak of the situation now prevailing in that island. It had noted the statements made by the United Kingdom representative in Sub-Committee I and had been pleased to learn that the United Kingdom Government had taken the necessary steps to enable the people of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to exercise their right to self-determination and independence. The statements of the United Kingdom representative were in accord with the actual facts, in the three Territories concerned. The Malagasy delegation therefore welcomed the attitude of the United Kingdom regarding the islands in the Indian Ocean, and could not support all the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of Sub-Committee I.

160. The representative of Finland said that, as a member of the Sub-Committee, he had already had the opportunity of expressing his Government's views on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena. As he had said in the Sub-Committee on 13 April 1967, although the three Territories might have certain elements in common, there were striking differences between them in many important respects and it was difficult to visualize any common pattern for their future. He had added that Mauritius was well on the road towards full independence. That view had been substantiated by the Mauritian Prime Minister's statement of 13 May 1967 that elections would take place at the very latest before the end of September of the current year. The political development of the Seychelles seemed to be somewhat slower and it seemed not unlikely that some form of special constitutional arrangements might be advisable in the interim.

161. He re-emphasized that, whatever future course might be chosen by the three Territories, it was essential that the final choice should be made by the freely elected majority. Although there had been some regrettable delays, it appeared to him that the majority of the people in question had, in fact, the opportunity of deciding the future of their own countries.

162. A number of the conclusions and recommendations contained in the Sub-Committee's report were not in accordance with the views his delegation had expressed in the Sub-Committee, nor did they accurately reflect the progress towards self-determination which had taken place in the Territories in question. ,163. The representative of Italy said that his delegation had not only examined with great care the report of Sub-Committee I, but had followed with close attention the political development of the Territories in question. It had noted with great satisfaction that significant steps had been taken to ensure for their populations the right and the means freely to express their preferences concerning their future status. In the case of Mauritius, it was noteworthy that the Prime Minister intended to organize elections not later than the end of September 1967. 164. Italy's chief concern was that the people of the islands should have the right to determine their future status by democratic means, and such appeared to be the case. Under the circumstances, he viewed with some misgivings the conclusions contained in the report which did not seem to coincide with his delegation's assessment of the situation.

165. The representative of Venezuela said that he had studied with interest the report of Sub-Committee I on the question of Mauvitius, Seychelles and St. Helena, Unquestionably, the report gave a very complete account of the political; economic and social conditions prevailing in those three Territories. His delegation was in general agreement with the recommendations and conclusions of the Sub-Committee, 166. He did not, however, share the view expressed in paragraph 127 of the report concerning military bases and installations. There was insufficient proof of the existence of such bases to warrant the claim that they created international tension and aroused concern in neighbouring countries. Nor could it support paragraph 137 of the report, in which the Sub-Committee prejudged the question of future military activities and claimed that they would constitute an act of hostility towards the peoples of Africa and Asia and a threat to international peace and security.

167. The representative of the United States of America said that he wished to comment on the sweeping and unsubstantiated statements made by a petitioner and some representatives with respect to his country. He wished to state categorically that his country had no plans to construct military bases in the British Indian Ocean Territory. In that connexion, he pointed out that a United Kingdom spokesman had recently given a similar assurance. Although there was an agreement between his country and the United Kingdom to permit the utilization of the British Indian Ocean Territory for refuelling or communications facilities, no decision had been taken to establish any such facilities.

168. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation had no intention of disputing the statement made by the United States representative. He wished, however, to know whether the statement had the approval of the United Kingdom also. Had it in fact been made on behalf of that country?

169. The representative of the United States of America replied that he had made no statement on behalf of the United Kingdom; he had simply referred to a similar statement made by a United Kingdom spokesman.

IV. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

170. The representative of Ethiopia introduced a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.411/Rev.1) on the three Territories co-sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iraq, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic Tanzania and Yugoslavia.

171. The draft resolution was based on the report of Sub-Committee I (see annual and expressed the serious concern felt by the co-sponsors at the fact that, as stated in paragraph 124 of the report, the administering Power had still not implemented General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and other relevant resolution concerning Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena. The co-sponsors urged the administering Power to expedite the process of decolonization in those Territary. The representative of Iraq said that he seconded the draft resolution as urged all members of the Special Committee to vote for it. He drew attention the operative paragraph concerning military bases which the administering Prin co-operation with the United States, was proposing to establish in Maurical Seychelles which constituted a serious threat to the area, to the peace and of Africa, Asia and the Middle East and to the national liberation movement operating in those areas.

173. The representative of Poland said that while his delegation supported draft resolution in general, it regretted that the preambular paragraphs come no reference to the Sub-Committee's concern that the administering Power we continuing to violate the territorial integrity of the Territories and to defeneral Assembly resolutions 2066 (XX) and 2232 (XXI) and that the steps to taking in the economic and social sectors to safeguard the interests of the peoples of the Territories were inadequate.

174. At the next meeting, the representative of Ethiopia submitted on behalthe co-sponsors, an oral revision to the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.41%) in which in operative paragraph 7, the phrase "to dismantle such military installations" was replaced by the phrase "to desist from establishing submilitary installations". The co-sponsors considered that the revision (A/AC.109/L.411/Rev.2) would make it quite clear that the resolution also to existing military bases.

175. The representative of Bulgaria said that the draft resolution submitted by the African and Asian countries and Yugoslavia reflected the main recommendations of the Sub-Committee's report and contained the necessary requests to the administering Power to implement fully the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Bulgarian delegation had hoped that the original draft resolution would contain a reference such as that included in the Sub-Committee's report to the activities of the United Kingdom and to the demands addressed to it by the United Nations. It was therefore pleased that the sponsors had accepted the amendment proposed by the Polish delegation to include a new introductory paragraph to express the Special Committee's deep regret that the administering Power had failed to implement resolution 1514 (XV). The General Assembly should pay particular attention to that matter and his delegation thought that, before the opening of the twenty-second session, the Special Committee should have another opportunity to examine the attitude of the administering Power. That had probably also been the sponsors' reason for drafting paragraph 8, requesting the United Kingdom to report to the Special Committee on the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

176. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that he would have preferred, as a representative of an African country, not to make any comment on a draft resolution submitted by the Afro-Asian group, which regarded colonialism as a kind of cancerous tumour in the centre of Africa. His delegation was ready to give its full support to the Special Committee's efforts to deal with the last vestiges of the crumbling colonial system. The climate in the Special Committee must be such that all representatives without exception, and particularly the members of the Afro-Asian group, could associate themselves with the Committee's decisions, decisions which, in a general way, expressed the desire of all to help the peoples of the remaining dependent territories. Such a spirit of co-operation and understanding was the vital factor which would enable the Committee to obtain the results expected of it.

177. His delegation would therefore have liked to be among the sponsors of the draft resolution, which, as a whole, reflected the aspirations of the international community as expressed in the basic resolution of the General Assembly, resolution 1514 (XV), on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. Regrettably, however, it had been unable to join the sponsors because its request for a compromise on operative paragraph 7 relating to military installations had been rejected. The statement appearing in that paragraph was not necessarily in accordance with the facts. Moreover, even if bases existed in certain dependent countries, it was for those countries, when they obtained independence, to negotiate the removal of the bases with the former administering Power, as had happened in all the African countries which had become independent. The question was within the exclusive competence of the countries concerned. The Ivory Coast, which had subscribed to the doctrine of non-intervention in the internal affairs of States, could not go back on the principles which it had endorsed and to which it intended to remain loyal. 178. There should be no misunderstanding of the significance of that reservation, for the Ivory Coast, which had fought against colonialism for many long years and would continue to do so, remained faithful to the principles of decolonization. It was aware that military activities created tensions in the world. It understood the concern of certain delegations and respected their position. The purpose of the Special Committee, however, was to promote decolonization, and it should make sure that its decisions could be applied. It should seek the most objective way of bringing the countries under foreign domination to self-determination and independence and not choose courses which, on the contrary, would tend to harden positions and delay the solution of the problem of decolonization. The Ivory Coast delegation, while expressing reservations on operative paragraph 7, supported the other provisions of the draft resolution and would vote for it. 179. The representative of Italy said that operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution was extraneous to the colonial issue and involved considerations outside the Special Committee's purview. His delegation would, therefore, absuain from voting. 180. The representative of Venezuela noted with regret that the draft resolution did not take into account the recommendation of Sub-Committee α that the General did not take into account the recommendation of Sub-Committee I that the General Assembly should set a time-limit for the granting of independence to Mauritius and accelerate the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) in respect of Seychelles and St. Helena. There was no reference either to the recommendation concerning the ming of a visiting mission to the Territories to ascertain the extent of the rogress made in the direction of self-determination and independence. Although his elegation would have preferred a text which took greater account of realities, it cald nevertheless vote for the draft resolution.

Although the draft resolution despite certain doubts about the wording. Although the Laguage was somewhat exaggerated, his delegation was, nevertheless, able to support the draft resolution as a whole, in line with its constant policy of supporting any measures designed to further the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), irrespective of the size of the Territory concerned or its distance from world markets. The latter considerations could not, however, be entirely overlooked.

182. The representative of the United States of America said that he intended to note against the draft resolution which did not constitute a realistic and balanced appraisal of the situation in the Territories in question. The issue of Mauritian independence would be decided in the coming elections to be held this fall. If the population desired independence, it was possible that the Territory would become independent in early 1968. The Seychelles were also moving steadily and impressively in the direction of self-determination. Despite, therefore, his delegation's full approval of operative paragraph 2 of the draft resolution, he was unable to accept later operative paragraphs which were not consistent with the actual situation. It also had reservations concerning the Sub-Committee's report.

183. At its 539th meeting the Special Committee adopted the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.411/Rev.2) as orally revised, by a roll call vote of 17 to 2 with 3 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq,

Ivory Coast, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, United States of America.

Abstaining: Finland, Italy, Madagascar.

184. The representative of Australia said, in explanation of his vote, that the normal approach in such a matter would have been to ask the administering Power to explain anything that was not readily apparent in current developments. Not only had no such approach been made, but a statement by a representative of the administering Power had been completely ignored as had the many practical steps which had been taken in the direction of independence for the Territories in question. Self-determination meant that a Territory was perfectly entitled to decide, by a majority vote, whether or not it desired independence. Operative paragraph 7 was completely unacceptable, especially in view of the statements that had been made by representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States that there was no intention of establishing military installation on the island. Appeals had been launched to the administering Power to grant immediate independence to the Territories on the principle of "Heads I win; tails you lose". If immediate independence were granted, without proper preparation, the administering Power would be blamed. That gambling attitude was not one which should be adopted where the future of nations and populations was at stake. Under the circumstances, his delegation had had no alternative but to vote against the draft resolution.

185. The representative of India remarked he had been both surprised and disappointed that the delegations of Australia and the United States had voted against the draft resolution. He failed to realize what they had found in the terso obnoxious that they were forced to vote against it. It had reaffirmed the inalienable right of the peoples of those Territories to self-determination, freedom and independence; it had urged the administering Power to hold free elections and to grant to the Territories whatever political status their peoples should freely choose. It had deplored any dismemberment of the Territories and had declared that the establishment of military installations would be a violation of General Assembly resolution 2232 (XXI). He failed to understand that anything in those provisions could cause a freedom-loving country to vote against the resolution.

186. He particularly regretted the unfortunate "gambling" analogy used by the representative of Australia. The sponsors of the draft resolution had made a serious appraisal of the problems facing those Territories and he deplored the fact that the attitude of responsible representatives of responsible Governments should be described as "gambling".

- 7. The Chairman added that he was deeply disappointed that the Australian presentative should have used such an analogy, after all the work that in-Committee I had put into its report. It was regrettable that the administering over had seen fit to be absent from the Special Committee's deliberations, but that did not justify the use of such intemperate language.
- $\frac{3}{2}$. The representative of the United States of America said he had made a statement uplaining his vote and had been very much surprised by the unprecedented request findia for further explanation. He considered that the statement he had already ade fully explained the position of his delegation and Government.
- B). The representative of Yugoslavia said that some representatives had explained that abstentions on or opposition to the draft resolution on the grounds of perative paragraph 7. It was denied that either the United States or the United Engdom had any intention of establishing such bases. In that connexion, he pointed out that The New York Times had reported a story to the effect that the Inited Kingdom was in the final stages of negotiations to purchase three islands in the Indian Ocean for defence purposes. Another paper had stated that the Inited States and the United Kingdom were planning to build an airstrip on one of those islands. Those two articles constituted sufficient proof for his delegation that the two Powers in question were intending to construct a military base and that operative paragraph 7 was fully justified.
- 190. The representative of Mali thanked all who had voted for the draft resolution which was directed towards speeding the process of decolonization in a particularly sensitive region of the world. He regretted that cold war considerations should have been introduced and he associated himself with the statements of the Chairman and the representatives of India and Yugoslavia. He was surprised that colonial Ewers which claimed to support the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples should change their attitude when it came to taking concrete measures to give effect to that Declaration. He was particularly astonished by the words of the representative of Australia, a country which had exterminated its indigenous inhabitants and was sending troops to Viet-Nam to prevent the people of that country from enjoying their most elementary rights.

191. The representative of the United States of America said, in reply to the representative of Yugoslavia, that, excellent paper though it was, The New York Times was not an official organ of the United States Government and its reports in no way reflected the policy of his Government.

192. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the vote against the draft resolution by two delegations had demonstrated, beyond all reasonable doubt, the true position of their countries and their attitude towards the principle of self-determination. In view of the repeated statements by representatives of the United States Government that their country supported the cause of decolonization, that vote had come as a disagreeable surprise. As the representative of the United States had referred to the "British Indian Ocean Territory", he pointed out that the United Nations had refused to recognize that Territory, the establishment of which was no more than a colonialist manoeuvre. 193. The representative of Australia, exercising his right of reply to the representative of Mali, explained that his reference to gambling had been a strictly personal reaction. He had not meant to suggest that the Sub-Committee or the Special Committee approached its work in the spirit of a gambler. The representative of Mali had also referred to the indigenous inhabitants of Australia That was a matter within the domestic jurisdiction of the Australian Government. Although Australia could not claim that it had no reason for self-reproach, the indigenous inhabitants were not being assassinated as the representative of Mali had stated. He added that the question of Viet-Nam was not within the Special Committee's terms of reference.

194. The text of the resolution on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena (A/AC.109/249), adopted by the Special Committee at its 539th meeting on 19 June 1967 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee,

"Having examined the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena,

"Having heard the statement of the petitioner,

"Noting with regret the absence of the representatives of the administering Power,

"Noting with deep regret the failure of the administering Power to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, be applied to them too. Those who were planning for the peace of the world, convinced of the ultimate irresistibility of such demands and of their relevance to the success or failure of their plans, finally came round to recognize the principle of self-determination -- no longer as a right of certain "nations" only, no longer as a principle of self-limitation imposed upon themselves by Colonial and other powers, but as a principle of human dignity and of peace, applicable to all peoples: a principle which peace planners could disregard only at their, and the world's, peril. It was against this background that the statesmen gathered in San Francisco in 1945, addressed themselves to the task of "saving succeeding generations from the scourge of war" by ensuring -- among other things -- respect for the "right of self-determination of peoples."

ii. THE PRINCIPLE OF SELF-DETERMINATION AT THE SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE:

The United Nations Conference on International Organization began with a concept of self-determination which was basically "non-colonial" in character. When it ended the principle had become very much associated with the question of colonialism. With the possible exception of the United States, the governments which participated in the Dumbarton Oaks Conversations and in the San Francisco Conference were mainly interested in the situation arising from the past war. Their thoughts were focused on the past war and its causes; and they thought of the projected organization as a means of preventing a repetition of the abuses of the pre-war period. As far as they were concerned the principle that needed to be emphasized the most was the principle that all states -- big and small -were equal. There was, at this stage, little concern for the rights of "non-state" groups or peoples. In any case, the vital interests of some of these powers were so deeply involved in the colonial area that they considered it prudent to maintain a certain degree of silence on the matter. a result, the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals did not make any mention of either the principle of self-determination or of dependent peoples. Even the Yalta Agreement which sought to make up for the omission, merely concerned itself with the question of the International Trusteeship System which was designed to replace the old League Mandates System.

By the time the San Francisco Conference convened, however, the "principle of self-determination" had found its way onto the Agenda of the Conference as an Amendment to the Dum-39 barton Oak Proposals. Similarly, although the question of trusteeship had been raised in neither the original proposals nor in the sponsor's amendments, it was placed on the Conference Agenda with the support of the four sponsoring governments and allocated to Committee 11/4 of the Conference.

Both questions caused a great deal of controversy in the commissions, committees and sub-committees of the Conference. The principle of self-determination, in particular, was the subject of some delicate soul-searching. None of the participating governments could openly oppose the inclusion of such a "generally accepted" principle in the Charter; and yet there were a number of participants who were not very happy about the prominence that was being given to this principle. According to the original Dumbarton Oaks Proposals, one of the purposes of the organization was to be: "To develop friendly relations among nations and take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace." To this the Soviet Union proposed, and the other three powers agreed to add the phrase: "Based on respect for the principle of equal rights and selfdetermination of peoples." The reasons for this amendment were nowhere spelled out, nor indeed was any attempt made then to clarify the significance that the principle was expected to have in the overall purposes of the United Nations. 44 indications were, however, given in later discussions within the committees and commissions of the Conference. The first indication was in the text of the Amendment itself: The Amendment clearly did not limit itself to "states" but extended the right of self-determination to "peoples." While there might have been considerable doubt as to what was meant by "peoples", the doubt was, at least partly, cleared by the discussion in the drafting sub-committee. Here the attempt of the Belgian Delegate to narrow the application of the principle to "states" as such was not successful. The sub-committee went on to explain that Paragraph 2A Article 1 was intended to "proclaim the equal rights of peoples as such" and consequently their right to self-determination. The equality of rights they were talking about "extends . . . to states, nations and peoples." In spite of subsequent attempts to qualify this interpretation, this view of the matter was allowed to prevail. was allowed to gain currency that the United Nations was deeply concerned with all threats to international peace and that the denial of the right of self-determination to some people (not necessarily a state) may present such a threat. At San Francisco therefore, it appears that final -- howbeit oblique -recognition was given to the new and gradually developing concept of self-determination which applied to all "peoples" no matter where they were or their political status. It appears that the words of the Atlantic Charter had been given their literal meaning.

Nevertheless the application of the principle of self-determination to Colonial peoples and to other dependent peoples had not been raised specifically in the discussions prior to the Conference. The number of amendments which were submitted by the participating states to the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals, all dealt with the International Trusteeship System, and envisaged an arrangement under which the administering powers would have the discretion to decide which of their dependent territories they would place under the control of the United Nations. Thus the terms of reference of Committee II/4 to which was allocated the question of Trusteeship, were simply "to prepare . . . draft provisions or principles and mechanisms of such a system of international Trusteeship for such dependent territories as may by subsequent agreement be placed thereunder." With this as its terms of reference, it was not very likely that the Committee would have anything at all to do with the principle of self-determination. was not until the Governments of the United Kingdom and Australia introduced their proposals on the "Principle of Trusteeship" that the question of self-determination in the "colonial context" was discussed at the Conference. The United Kingdom and Australian proposals related to a Principle of Trusteeship that would apply to all dependent peoples in addition to the "Machinery of Trusteeship" that was to apply only to those territories which would be brought under it by agreement with, and at the discretion of, the powers responsible for their administration. In the discussion of these proposals the principle of self-determination was naturally introduced. At the fourth meeting of Committee II/4 of the Conference, the Soviet Delegate specifically mentioned the principle of self-determination and said that it was relevant to the Trusteeship System that was being discussed. Other delegates followed this lead and claimed that the right of self-determination which had been proclaimed in the purposes of the Charter should be made applicable to all peoples -- colonial and non-colonial. though specific mention of the principle was not made in the chapters dealing with the colonial peoples and other dependent peoples (Chapters XI-XIII) the discussions left little doubt that the relevance of the principle to those peoples was recog-The colonial powers rejected the assumption that "self-determination" was the same as "independence"; but they did not question the validity of the principle of self-determination itself. For example, the United Kingdom delegate warned " . . . against confusing independence with liberty. What the dependent peoples wanted was an increasing measure of self-government. Independence would come, if at all, by 55 natural development," he added. The Charter stressed in Chapters XI-XIII, the principle that the interests of the peoples of the non-self-governing and Trust territories were paramount. It proclaimed that among the factors "to be taken into account" by the administering powers in colonial and Trust territories were "the political aspirations of the inhabitants of these territories, . . . the progressive development of their political institutions and their progressive development towards self-government or independence." Although at a later date different interpretations were to be put on these general proclamations, the impression was not at this time challenged that, in Chapters XI to XIII, the Charter of the United Nations was guaranteeing, in some form, the right of the colonial and dependent peoples to exercise self-determination -- even if that $57$ exercise was to be in the distant future.

In spite, therefore, of the later attempts to tone down . some of the over-enthusiastic statements and sweeping asser-58 it appears that tions made at the San Francisco Conference, the Conference gave recognition and expression to a concept of self-determination which was very different from the concept as it was generally regarded before 1945. By admitting that the principle applied to all "peoples", by recognizing that its denial would lead to a disturbance of international peace, and by linking it so inextricably with the question of human rights, the great powers of the world had clearly accepted that it could not therefore, be limited by geographical, or racial factors. Before long the international community was to declare -- perhaps less convincingly -- that the application of the principle could not be limited by any conditions whatever. Henceforth the principle of selfdetermination was to be both a principle for the internal regulation of the state's affairs and of international order and human rights. It is against the background of this "San Francisco Legacy" that we have to examine and appraise the role which the United Nations has played or sought to play in the application of the principle of self-determination.

iii. SELF-DETERMINATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS 1945-1962.

One of the very first resolutions to be passed by the first session of the General Assembly (held in London in 1946) was on the subject of colonial peoples. The resolution on "Non-Self-Governing Peoples" dealt with the measures to be instituted to implement the provisions of the Charter dealing with the peoples "who have not as yet attained a full measure of self-government." The General Assembly expressed the hope that the realization of the objectives of Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter would make possible the attainment of the political, economic, social and educational aspirations of the non-self-governing peoples. Since then the United Nations has, through its many organs and special agencies, expended great effort and much time to hasten the realization of these objectives. In doing this the United Nations has clearly let it be known that it recognizes that the peoples of these territories are entitled to the right of selfdetermination. The right of self-determination: the right of "every people to determine how and by whom they will be governed" has been one of the corner stones of the United Nations' activities since 1945.

The United Nations had hardly begun to function when it was called upon to participate in the solution of a dispute in which the principle of self-determination featured very prominently. This was the dispute between the government of the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the (as yet) non-sovereign Republic of the United States of Indonesia. The attempts to settle the dispute through negotiation and the "good offices" of friendly government had failed, and open hostilities had broken out between the two parties. The attempts by friendly states to get a cessation of hostilities were not unsuccessful, so the matter was brought to the notice of the Security 61 Council. Although the two requests for Security Council action did not specifically mention the principle of self-determination, that principle and the related question of colonialism were much in evidence during the debates.

From the beginning the Netherlands Government challenged the competence of the United Nations in the dispute, since it maintained that the whole matter was within its exclusive do63 mestic jurisdiction. This was not accepted, however, and the Council proceeded to assume, at first hesitantly and later more boldly, a direct and significant role in the settlement of the dispute. In the end the Council not only requested, organized and supervised the actual cessation of hostilities, but also set up the "Committee of Good Offices" which participated in and significantly influenced the eventual political settlement. In the very first years of its life the United Nations Organization had exercised a role in this field which few had envisaged it would or could do effectively.

In all this, however, the competence of the United Nations was persistently challenged and there were many who maintained that the role of the United Nations in the application of the principle of self-determination was to be limited to that of 66 a mere "enunciator of that principle." The equally persistent claims of other members that the organization had "a right and a responsibility to ensure that the principle was universally applied" was written off as a mere attempt to endow the organization with powers it did not have and could not 67 exercise.

Nevertheless the United Nations, through its various organs, continued to receive and act on claims in which the principle of self-determination was invoked. Since the Indonesian dispute the United Nations has acted on a great number of claims in which the principle of self-determination has featured very prominently. There have been claims by independent states against other independent states whom they accuse of trying to subvert their independence and sovereignty. Examples of such claims are the Greek claim against its Northern neighbors in 1946, the Czechoslovakian complaint against the Soviet Union in 1946, the claim of the state of Hyderabad against the Indian Union in 1948, the complaint of the Government of Yugoslavia against the Soviet Union and the other Eastern European communist states in 1951, the Iranian complaint against the Soviet Union in 1946, and the complaint by the government of Imre Nagy against Soviet intervention in the affairs of Hungary in 1956. There have also been claims by independent states which allege that other states are depriving some people of their right to self-determination. Examples of such claims are the Pakistani claim against India in respect of Kashmir, the Greek claim against the United Kingdom in respect of Cyprus, the Indonesian and Netherlands claims against each other in respect of Dutch New Guinea (West Irian) and the Moroccan claim against France in respect of Mauritannia. The United Nations has also dealt with claims from colonial and other dependent peoples in which the principle of self-determination has been claimed to be relevant. In the disposition of the former Italian colonies the principle of self-determination was raised in the case of Lybia, Eritrea and in some sense in the solution of the Palestine The principle was claimed to be relevant in the United Nations attempts to unify and guarantee the independence of Korea in the first post-war years; and it was invoked frequently in the controversy about the Problem of Unifying the Ewe people of British and French Togoland between 1948 and 1956. The principle has also been invoked in the solution of the problems relating to the future of the Trust territories of Camerroons, Ruanda-Urundi and in the dispute over the administration and future of South-West Africa. the principle of self-determination has been pressed into service in the program of "decolonization" which has become one tion especially over the past half decade. In the program of decolonization, the principle of self-determination is invoked in addition to the need to maintain "international peace and security," which is one of the principle objectives of the United Nations. The combined principles of self-determination and the maintenance of international peace have been invoked before the United Nations in a number of situations chief among which are the Algerian situation, the question of Angola, the claims of Morocco and Tunisia against France and the question of South-West Africa. This combination of principles was one of the chief props on which the historic "Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Peoples and 74 Territories" of 1960 was based.

Moreover the United Nations has discussed and taken action on the principle of self-determination even when there have been no concrete claims by any people for that right.

On their own motion, various organs of the United Nations have made extensive studies on different aspects of the principle and in relation to different situations. In 1951, the General Assembly in a resolution, requested that the Commission on Human Rights should include an article on "Self-determination" in the Covenant of Human Rights which that Commission was then discussing in draft form. Since that request, the Commission of Human Rights, the Economic and Social Council, the Third Committee of the General Assembly and the Plenary Session of the General Assembly have continuously studied and discussed the principle of self-determination from a variety of angles: both in regard to its theoretical contents and in regard to the measures and procedures which the United Nations, "having regard to its limitations in competence and resources" can take with a view to ensuring a wider and more adequate appli-These studies have related to the cation of the principle. principle as it is to be applied to peoples in colonial territories and to independent states. In connection with selfdetermination for colonial peoples, the General Assembly, with the help of special committees (standing committees or temporary ad hoc committees) has made a number of important studies on the principles and modes of applying the principle in particular situations. Perhaps the most important of these studies have been the studies which were made between 1951 and 1960 on the factors and principles which should guide the Assembly and its members in deciding whether in each case a territory has ceased to be a dependent (non-self-governing) territory and has effectively exercised its right of self-determination. The first of these studies was made in 1951 by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1951. On the basis of its report, the General Assembly appointed an ad hoc committee to examine the question further. committee produced a report in 1953 to which was annexed a Comprehensive List of Factors indicative of the attainment of certain outcomes that were considered to be equivalent to the "full measure of self-government" which the Charter The General Assembly approved this list as a stipulates. guide for future decision, but asserted that "each concrete case should be considered and decided upon in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into 79 the right of self-determination of peoples." three unsuccessful attempts in 1956, 1957 and 1958, the General Assembly appointed another Committee to make a study of the "Principles which should guide members (of the United Nations) in determining whether any territory fell under the designation of non-self-governing territory, and hence was one for which the member in charge had assumed the obliga-80 tions contained in Chapter XI of the Charter." mittee of six member states, submitted its report in 1960. It embodied 12 principles which the General Assembly later approved in the form of a resolution.

The United Nations concern for the principle of self-determination for colonial peoples reached its culmination in the historic declaration of 1960 in which the General Assembly asked for the immediate and unconditional granting of 82 independence to all colonial peoples and territories. In 1961, and even more revolutionary resolution for the first time set up a United Nations Committee with the express duty

"to supervise and hasten the process of decolonization in consultation and collaboration with the administering au83 thorities." The activities of the Committee of Seventeen 84 as indicated in its report, and the subsequent decision of the General Assembly at its seventeenth session, to enlarge the committee and amplify its terms of reference were all the natural development of the movements that were set in 85 motion in 1945.

The United Nations, which began as a "mere enunciator" of the principle of self-determination, with no admitted competence or function in its application or the machinery to perform any, has gradually but systematically become the most active international agency directly engaged in applying and supervising the application of the principle to all peoples. The United Nations is now not only the "midwife" of new states born under the aegis of that principle, but also the physician and nurse to these new juridical infants. It seeks to give all peoples not only the right to exercise self-determination to choose their political systems and associations, but the right to maintain this independence and to maintain also the other rights which have been found to be part of the principle of self-determination; the right to inviolability of territory and of sovereignty over natural wealth and resources. The United Nations has certainly travelled a long way from San Francisco in the same way that San Francisco was a long way from Versailles and from the days before 1914.

THE MAURITIUS INDEPENDENCE ORDER, 1968

GN No. 54 of 1968

His Excellency the Governor directs the publication, for general information, of the Mauritius Independence Order, 1968.

- (2) The Emergency Powers Order in Council 1939(e), and any Order in Council amending that Order, shall cease to have effect as part of the law of Mauritius on the appointed day:

Provided that if Part 11 of the Emergency Powers Order in Council 1939 is in operation in Mauritius immediately before the appointed day a Proclamation such as is referred to in paragraph (b) of section 19(7) of the, Constitution shall be deemed to have been made on that day and to have been approved by the Assembly within seven days of that day under paragraph (a) of section 19(8) of the Constitution.

- 4.-(1) Subject to the provisions of this Order, the Constitution shall come into effect in Mauritius on the appointed day.
- (2) The Governor (as defined for the purposes of the existing Orders) acting after consultation with the Prime Minister (as so defined) may at any time after the commencement of this subsection exercise any of the powers conferred upon the Governor-General by section 5 of this Order or by the Constitution to such extent as may in his opinion be necessary or expedient to enable the Constitution to function as from the appointed day.
- 5.-(1) The revocation of the existing Orders shall be without prejudice to the continued operation of any existing laws made, or having effect as if they had been made, under any of those Orders; and any such laws shall have effect on and after the appointee, day as if they had been made in pursuance of the Constitution and shall be construed with such modifications, adaptations, qualifications and exceptions as may be necessary to bring them into conformity with the Mauritius Independence Act 1968 (f) and this Order.
- (2) Where any matter that falls to be prescribed or otherwise provided for under the Constitution by Parliament or by any other authority or person is prescribed or provided for by or under an existing law (including any amendment to any such law made under this section) or is otherwise prescribed or provided for immediately before the appointed day by or under the existing Orders that prescription or provision shall, as from that day, have effect (with such modifications, adaptations, qualifications and exceptions as may be necessary to bring it into conformity with the Mauritius Independence Act 1968 and this Order) as if it had been made under the Constitution by Parliament or, as the case may require, by the other authority or person.
- (3) The Governor-General may, by order published in the Gazette, at any time before 6th September 1968 make such amendments to any existing law (other than the Mauritius Independence Act 1968 or this Order) as may appear to him to be necessary or expedient for bringing that law into conformity with the provisions of this Order or otherwise for giving effect or enabling effect to be given to those provisions.

- (4) An order made under this section may be amended or revoked by Parliament or, in relation to any existing law affected thereby, by any other authority having power to amend, repeal or revoke that existing law.
- (5) It is hereby declared, for the avoidance of doubt, that, save as otherwise provided either expressly or by necessary implication, nothing in this Order shall be construed as affecting the continued operation of any existing law.
- (6) The provisions of this section shall be without prejudice to any powers conferred by this Order or any other law upon any person or authority to make provision for any matter, including the amendment or repeal of any existing law.
- 6.-(1) Where any office has been established by or under the existing Orders or any existing law and the Constitution establishes a similar or an equivalent office any person who, immediately before the appointed day, holds or is acting in the former office shall, so far as is consistent with the provisions of the Constitution, be deemed to have been appointed on the appointed day to hold or to act in the latter office in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution and to have taken any necessary oaths under the Constitution and, in the case of a person who holds or is acting in the office of a judge of the Supreme Court, to have complied with the requirements of section 79 of the Constitution (which relates to oaths):

Provided that any person who under the existing Orders or any existing law would have been required to vacate his office at the expiration of any period or on the attainment of any age shall vacate his office under the Constitution at the expiration of that period or upon the attainment of that age.

- (2) Section 113(1) of the Constitution shall have effect-
 - (a) in relation to the person holding the office of Electoral Commissioner immediately before the appointed day as is it permitted him to be appointed to that office on the appointed day for a term expiring on .30th November 1969 or such later date as may be determined by the Judicial and Legal Service Commission; and
 - (b) in relation to the person holding the office of Commissioner of Police immediately before the appointed day as if it permitted him to be appointed to that office on the appointed day for a term expiring on such date (not being, earlier than 31st March 1969 or later than 3m September 1969) as may be determined by the Police Service Commission; and those persons shall be deemed to have been appointed as aforesaid and, in relation to them, the reference in section 113 (1) to the specified term shall be construed accordingly.
- (3) The provisions of this section shall be without prejudice to any powers conferred by or under the Constitution upon any person or authority to make provision for the abolition of offices and for the removal from office of persons holding or acting in any office.

- 7.-(1) Until such time as it is otherwise provided under section 39 of the Constitution, the respective boundaries of the twenty constituencies in the Island of Mauritius shall be the same as those prescribed by the Mauritius (Electoral Provisions) Regulation, 1966 (a) for the twenty electoral districts established by those Regulations in pursuance of the Mauritius (Electoral Provisions) Order 1966(b).
- (2) If any election of a member of the Assembly is held in any constituency before 1st February 1969, and it is prescribed that any register of electors published before 1st February 1967 is to be used, then no person shall be entitled to vote in that constituency-
 - (a) in the case of a constituency in the Island of Mauritius, unless, in pursuance of the Mauritius (Electoral Provisions) Order 1966, he has been registered as an elector in the electoral district corresponding to that constituency;
 - (b) in the case of Rodrigues, unless, in Pursuance Of the Mauritius (Electoral Provisions) Order 11965(a) y he has been registered as an elector in Rodrigues as if Rodrigues had been established as an electoral district for the purposes of that Order.
- 8. (1) The persons who immediately before the appointed day were members of the existing Assembly shall as from the appointed day be members of the Assembly established by the Constitution as if elected as such in pursuance of section 31(2) of the Constitution and shall hold their seats in that Assembly in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution:

Provided that persons who immediately before the appointed day represented constituencies in the existing Assembly shall so hold their seats as if respectively elected to represent the corresponding constituencies under the Constitution.

- (2) Any person who is a member of the Assembly established by the Constitution by virtue of the preceding provisions of this section and who, since he was last elected as a member of the existing Assembly before the appointed day, has taken the oath of allegiance in pursuance of section 49 of the Constitution established by the existing Orders shall be deemed to have complied with the requirements of section 55 of the Constitution (which relates to the oath of allegiance).
- (3) The persons who immediately before the appointed day were unreturned candidates at the general election of members of the existing Assembly shall, until the dissolution of the Assembly next following the appointed day, be regarded as unreturned candidates for the purposes of paragraph 5 (7) of Schedule I to the Constitution; and for those purposes anything done in accordance with the provisions of Schedule I to the constitution established by the existing Orders shall be deemed to have been done in accordance with the corresponding provisions of Schedule 1 to the Constitution.
- (4) For the purpose of section 57(2) of this Constitution, the Assembly shall be deemed to have had its first sitting after a general election on 22nd August 1967 (being the date on which the existing Assembly first sat after a general election).

- 9. The rules and orders of the existing Assembly, as those rules and orders were in force immediately before the appointed day, shall, except as may be otherwise provided under section 48 of the Constitution, have effect after the appointed day as if they had been made under that section but shall be construed with such modifications, adaptations, qualifications and exceptions as may be necessary to bring them into conformity with this Order.
- 10. If by virtue of section 10(i) of the Mauritius (Constitution) Order 1966 the person referred to in section 9(i) of the Mauritius (Constitution) Order 1964(a) is immediately before the appointed day holding the office of Speaker of the existing Assembly, then, with effect from the appointed day-
 - (a) that person shall be deemed to be a member of the Assembly and to have been elected Speaker of the Assembly under section 32 of the Constitution; and
 - (b) the provisions of the Constitution (other than paragraphs (a), (b) and (e) of section 32(3)) shall apply to him accordingly, until such time as he vacates the office of Speaker under paragraph (c) or (d) of section $32\,\text{(,I)}$ of the Constitution or under section $32\,\text{(b)}$ of the Constitution or becomes a candidate for election as a member of the Assembly.

- 11. All proceedings commenced or pending before the Supreme Court, the Court of Civil Appeal or the Court of Criminal Appeal of Mauritius immediately before the appointed day may be carried on before the Supreme Court, the Court of Civil Appeal or the Court of Criminal Appeal, as the case may be, established by the Constitution.
- 12.-(1) Unless it is otherwise prescribed by Parliament, the Court of Appeal in Court of Appeal may exercise on and after the appointed day such jurisdiction and powers in relation to appeals from the Supreme Court of Seychelles as may be conferred upon it by or in the pursuance of the Seychelles Civil Appeals Order 1967 (b) or of any other law in that behalf for the time being in force in Seychelles.
- (2) The provisions of section 81 of the Constitution shall not apply in relation to decisions -of the Court of Appeal given in the exercise of any jurisdiction and powers conferred upon it in relation to appeals from the Supreme Court of Seychelles, and appeals shall lie to Her Majesty in Council from such decisions in accordance with the Seychelles (Appeals to Privy Council) Order 1967 (a) or any other law in that behalf for the time being in force in Seychelles.
- (3) The Seychelles Civil Appeals Order 1967 and the Seychelles (Appeals to Privy Council) Order 1967 shall cease to form part of the law of Mauritius with effect from the appointed day.
- 13.-(1) Until such time as a salary and allowances are prescribed by Parliament, there shall be paid to the holder of any office to which section 108 of the Constitution applies a salary and allowances calculated at the same rate as the salary and allowances paid immediately before the appointed day to the holder of the office corresponding thereto.

- (2) If the person holding the office of Governor immediately before the appointed day becomes Governor-General his terms and conditions of service, other than salary and allowances, as Governor-General shall, until such time as other provisions are made in that behalf, be the same as those attaching to the office of Governor immediately before the appointed day.
- 14. Any power that, immediately before the appointed day, is vested in a Commission established by any of the existing Orders and that, under that Order, is then delegated to some other person or authority shall be deemed to have been delegated to that person or authority on the appointed day in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution; and any proceedings commenced or pending before any such Commission immediately before the appointed day may be carried on before the appropriate Commission established by the Constitution.
- 15.-(1) If the Prime Minister so requests, the authorities having power to make appointments in any branch of the public service shall consider whether there are more local candidates suitably qualified for appointment to, or promotion in that branch than there are vacancies in that branch that could appropriately be filled by such local candidates; and those authorities, if satisfied that such is the case, shall, if so requested by the Prime Minister, select officer's in that branch to whom this section applies and whose retirement would in the opinion of those authorities cause vacancies that could appropriately be filled by such suitably qualified local candidates as are available and fit for appointment and inform the Prime Minister of the number of officers so selected; and if the Prime Minister specifies a number of officers so selected), those authorities shall nominate that number of officers from among the officers so selected and by notice in writing require them to retire from the public service; and any officer who is so required to retire shall retire accordingly.
- (2) A notice given under the preceding subsection requiring an officer to retire from the public service shall be not less than six months from the date he receives the notice, at the expiration of which he shall proceed on leave of absence pending retirement:

Provided that, with the agreement of the officer or if the Officer is on leave when it is given, a notice may specify a shorter period.

- (3) This section applies to any officer who is the holder of a pensionable office in the public service and is @a, designated Officer for the purposes of the Overseas Service (Mauritius) Agreement 1961.
- 16.-(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect for the purpose of enabling an officer to whom this section applies or his personal representatives to appeal against any of the following decisions, that is to say:-
 - (a) a decision of the appropriate Commission to give such concurrence as is required by subsection (1) or (2) of section 95 of the Constitution in relation to the refusal,

- withholding, reduction in amount or suspending of any pensions benefits in respect of such an officer's service as a public officer;
- (b) a decision of any authority to remove such an officer from office if the consequence of the removal is that any pensions benefits cannot be granted in respect of the officer's service as a public officer; or
- (c) a decision of any authority to take some other disciplinary action in relation to such an officer if the consequence of the action is, or in the opinion of the authority might be, to reduce the amount of any pensions benefits that may be granted in respect of the officer's service as a public officer,
- (2) Where any such decision as is referred to in the preceding subsection is taken by any authority, the authority shall cause to be delivered to the officer concerned, or to his personal representatives, a written notice of that decision stating the time, not being less than twenty-eight days from the date on which the notice is delivered, within which he, or his personal representatives, may apply to the authority for the case to be referred to an Appeals Board.
- (3) If application is duly made within the time stated in the notice, the authority shall notify the Prime Minister in writing of that application and the Prime Minister shall thereupon appoint an Appeals Board consisting of-
 - (a) one member selected by the Prime Minister;
 - (b) one member selected by an association representative of public officers or a professional body, nominated in either case by the applicant; and
 - (c) one member selected by the two other members jointly (or, in default of agreement between those members, by the judicial and Legal Service Commission) who shall be the chairman of the Board.
- (4) The Appeals Board shall enquire into the facts of the case, and for that purpose-
 - (a) shall, if the applicant so requests in writing, hear the applicant either in person or by a legal representative of his choice, according to the terms of the request, and shall consider any representations that he wishes to make in writing;
 - (b) may hear any other person who, in the opinion of the Board, is able to give the Board information on the case, and
 - (c) shall have access to, and shall consider, all documents that were available to the authority concerned and shall also consider any further document relating to the case that may be produced by or on behalf of the applicant or the authority.
- (6) When the Appeals Board has completed its consideration of the case, then-
 - (a) if the decision that is the subject of the reference to the Board is such a decision as is mentioned in paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of this section, the Board shall advise the appropriate Commission whether the decision should be affirmed, reversed or modified and the Commission shall act in accordance with that advice; and

- (b) if the decision that is the subject of the reference to the Board is such a decision as is referred to in paragraph (b) or paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of this section, the Board shall not have power to advise the authority concerned to affirm, reverse or modify the decision but-
 - (i) where the officer has been removed from office the Board may direct that there shall be granted all or any part of the pensions benefits that, under any law, might have been granted in respect of his service as a public officer if he had retired voluntarily at the date of his removal and may direct that any law with respect to pensions benefits shall in any other respect that the Board may specify have effect as if he tad so retired; and
 - (ii) where some other disciplinary action has been taken in relation to the officer the Board may direct that, on the grant of any pensions benefits under any law in respect of the officer's service as a public officer, those benefits shall be increased by such amount or shall be calculated in such manner as the Board may specify in order to offset all or any part of the reduction in the amount of those benefits that, in the opinion of the Board, would or might otherwise be a consequence of the disciplinary action, and any direction given by the Board under this paragraph shall be complied with notwithstanding the provisions of any other law. $\,$

(6) In this section-

"pensions benefits" has the meaning assigned to that expression in section 94 of the Constitution; and

"legal representative" means a person lawfully in or entitled to be in Mauritius and entitled to practise in Mauritius as a barrister or as an attorney-at-law;

- (7) This section applies to an officer who is the holder of a pensionable office in the public service and-
 - (a) who is a member of Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service or of Her Majesty's Overseas judiciary;
 - (b) who has been designated for the purposes of the Overseas Service (Mauritius) Agreement 1961; or
 - (c) who was selected for appointment to any office in the public service or whose appointment to any such office was approved by a Secretary of State,

17.-(1) Parliament may alter any of the provisions of this Order in the same manner as it may alter any of the provisions of this Constitution not specified in section 47(2) of the Constitution:

Provided that section 6 and section 8(4) and this section may be altered by Parliament only in the same manner as the provisions so specified.

(2) Section 47(4) of the Constitution shall apply for the purpose of construing references in this section to any provision of this Order and to the alteration of any such provision as it applies for the purpose of construing references in section 47 of the Constitution to any provision of the Constitution and to the alteration of any such provision.

CHAPTER I – THE STATE AND THE CONSTITUTION

1. The State

Fourth Schedule

Mauritius shall be a sovereign democratic State which shall be known as the Republic of Mauritius.

[S. 1 amended by Act 48 of 1991.]

2. Constitution is supreme law

This Constitution is the supreme law of Mauritius and if any other law is inconsistent with this Constitution, that other law shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be void.

CHAPTER II – PROTECTION OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS OF INDIVIDUAL

3. Fundamental rights and freedoms of individual

It is hereby recognised and declared that in Mauritius there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, place of origin, political opinions, colour, creed or sex, but subject to respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for the public interest, each and all of the following human rights and fundamental freedoms—

- the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and the protection of the law;
- (b) freedom of conscience, of expression, of assembly and association and freedom to establish schools; and
- (c) the right of the individual to protection for the privacy of his home and other property and from deprivation of property without compensation, and the provisions of this Chapter shall have effect for the purpose of affording protection to those rights and freedoms subject to such limitations of that protection as are contained in those provisions, being limitations designed to ensure that the enjoyment of those rights and freedoms by any individual does not prejudice the rights and freedoms of others or the public interest.

4. Protection of right to life

(1) No person shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in execution of the charges, the repayment or amortisation of debt, and all expenditure in connection with the raising of loans on the security of the revenues of Mauritius or the Consolidated Fund and the service and redemption of debt thereby created.

110. Director of Audit

THE LEGAL SIGNIFICANCE OF RE-CITATION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS

By Samuel A. Bleicher*

In recent years, scholarly attention has increasingly focused on the lawmaking effect of General Assembly resolutions.2 The citation of previous resolutions in later resolutions of the General Assembly is one potentially significant aspect of this question, yet there has been no examination of it in legal literature. Anyone familiar with the Assembly's work knows that the phenomenon is pervasive. 1,149 resolutions, just over half of the 2,247 passed in the first twenty-one sessions of the General Assembly, refer to previous resolutions, and the cited resolutions have been invoked an average of 2.68 times.3 More important from a legal standpoint is the fact that a very few resolutions have been cited much more often than the average. Resolution 1514(XV) was cited in 95 subsequent resolutions in the first six sessions following its passage, and Resolution 217(III) was cited 75 times in its first nineteen years. Seven resolutions have been referred to on more than sixteen occasions since their approval by the General Assembly, and seven have been cited more than twice in each session since passage.4 A consideration of the legal relevance of this phenomenon seems worth pursuing, and any such inquiry must begin first of all with an over-all theoretical analysis of General Assembly resolutions as a source of international law.

I. THE LAWMAKING RÔLE OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS

Although the General Assembly is not a legislature in the ordinary sense of the term, there are two special contexts in which it has generally recognized lawmaking powers. First, the Assembly clearly has legislative authority with respect to most of the internal operations of the United Nations. It directs and supervises the work of the Secretary General, the Economic and Social Council, and the Trusteeship Council, as well as the subsidiary organs it has established. It also approves the budget of the Organization and allocates its expenses, and it has the power, upon recommendation of the Security Council, to admit new Members and expel from the Organization Members which have "persistently violated the principles contained in the present Charter." As a result of its broad powers, the General Assembly is, except in the field of international peace and security, the predominant organ in the United Nations, and its decisions are largely responsible for the tasks and direction that the Organization undertakes.

Second, in relation to the rules of international law which govern the conduct of Member States outside the United Nations, it has been pointed out that decisions of the General Assembly which settle legal disputes have a legal significance independent of any formal lawmaking power given by the Charter. The settlement of any dispute, inside or outside the United Nations, constitutes a precedent which enters into the stream of decisions which may ultimately give rise to a rule of international law. The disposition of such disputes in the General Assembly typically hastens this evolution by providing a more extensive expression of state opinion on the dispute at hand and the legal rules which are invoked to justify the conduct of the parties. Thus, for example, the admission of the state of Israel to the United Nations over the objections of several Arab states and the United Kingdom that Israel did not have a defined territory and therefore was not a state, constituted a precedent for the proposition that disputed borders do not deprive an entity of the "defined territory" required for statehood.

^e U.N. Charter, Arts. 98, 66, 87, and 22, respectively. One authority has suggested that the primary legal significance of General Assembly resolutions arises not from the content of the resolutions themselves, but from the ability of the Assembly, by the "executive" activities of establishing committees of investigation and peace forces, to bring about some compliance with international law. See Skubiszewski, "The General Assembly of the United Nations and Its Power to Influence National Action," 1964 Proceedings, American Society Int. Law 153.

⁷ U. N. Charter, Art. 17.

⁸ U.N. Charter, Art. 4, par. 2.

⁹ U.N. Charter, Art. 6.

¹⁰ This theory of the importance of the practice of the General Assembly and the Security Council is the underlying rationale for the excellent work by Rosalyn Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of the United Nations (1963).

The rejection of similar objections to the admission of Kuwait and Mauritania has strengthened this rule.¹¹ But the legal significance of these precedents derives not from the content of the resolutions passed by the General Assembly, but from the fact that on a specific controverted question in a concrete case a particular decision was reached by the community of nations. The resolution admitting Israel to membership says nothing about defined territory as an attribute of statehood, either as a general matter or in relation to Israel specifically.¹² The resolutions admitting Mauritania ¹³ and Kuwait ¹⁴ similarly make no reference to this matter. The precedent and its legal relevance come from the decision, not from the resolution, and it is equally valuable if the decision is not embodied in a resolution at all, as is the case with the Security Council rule that abstention by a Great Power does not constitute a veto.¹⁵ The mechanism of law-creation involved here is custom, not convention or legislation.

The crucial question remains: Can a General Assembly resolution which announces in abstract form a rule governing state conduct outside of the United Nations have, by virtue of its content, a lawmaking effect? The United Nations Charter makes no allocation of formal prescriptive authority to the General Assembly. It provides only for General Assembly recommendations 16 in such fields as the maintenance of international peace and security and the principles on which it is based, the development and codification of international law, and the settlement of particular disputes among Member States.17 It might be argued that a state which has voted in favor of a resolution which "recommends" a rule of international law is obliged to act in accordance with that rule because of the expectations it has created. From a jurisprudential perspective, virtually all limitations on the conduct of states are properly justified on the basis of the expectation of others that their conduct will be so limited. Typically these limitations arise out of the universally recognized formality of signing a document containing an expression of these limitations or out of the previous conduct of the same or other states in similar contexts.¹⁸ The question here is whether there are circumstances in which assent to a proscription in the form of a vote in the General Assembly, either alone or in conjunction with other elements, can create such an expectation.¹⁹

¹⁶ Sloan, note 1 above, at 7-14, demonstrates rather convincingly that the word "recommend" was widely used before the drafting of the U.N. Charter to represent a higher degree of obligation than its "natural" meaning would indicate. His analysis leaves the question of its actual significance largely unanswered, however.

The difficulty is that there is no justifiable basis for any expectation about future conduct if it is clear at the outset that the assertion is not intended to control that conduct. There should be no obstacle to a "change of heart" by a state which finds advantage in altering its view of the law, unless there was initially some reason for others to believe that the asserting party intended to constrain itself by its words.²⁰ While it may be legitimate to expect some continuity in state policy, a vote for a particular General Assembly resolution by itself creates little more basis for a fixed expectation than does a unilateral declaration of intended future behavior by a representative of that state, which in the absence of special circumstances can be altered at will. This conclusion is particularly necessary in light of the emphasis on formalities in international legal doctrine.

However, if some basis is found for a reasonable expectation that a favorable General Assembly vote was thought by the voters to require conforming conduct, the difficulty of attributing legal significance to the General Assembly resolution is largely overcome. If, for example, a resolution declares a rule to be pre-existing law and attributes it to a recognized source of international law, a foundation has been established for reliance upon that resolution as a limitation on the freedom of action of at least those who voted for it. A nation's vote for such a resolution is in effect a public statement of adherence to the legal principles embodied in the resolution. Supporting states have thereby declared that an accepted rule of international law requires them to behave in the manner described by the resolution, and they must reasonably foresee that other states will take them at their word. If a state does rely on that assertion, it has a right to legal protection to avoid any injury that might flow from subsequent non-

18 An excellent analysis of the broad problem is presented in Schachter, "Towards a Theory of International Obligation," 8 Virginia Journal Int. Law 300 (1968).

19 The problem could be approached as one of estoppel, which is a generally accepted international law doctrine. MacGibbon, "Estoppel in International Law," 7 Int. and Comp. Law Q. 468 (1958). But an examination of the requisites of a "promissory estoppel" leads to the same problem described in the text. The principle underlying estoppel is the foreseeable creation of a reasonable expectation that a party will behave in a manner consistent with its assertions, followed by action by another in reliance upon that expectation which will result in injury to the acting party if the asserting party is permitted to ignore his own assertions. Invoking the doctrine of estoppel raises, but does not answer, the crucial question of how and to what extent a General Assembly vote creates the required expectation.

20 This is not to say that votes in the General Assembly cannot be relied upon because they are "politically" motivated. A state which, for whatever reason, openly supported a resolution in which it did not believe, should not be permitted to use that fact as a defense to an obligation built upon its public expression of support for the resolution, any more than a party to a treaty can avoid that obligation by demonstrating an ulterior motive for adherence. "True" motive on the part of the state voting for a resolution is not the missing element here, but reasonable basis for relying upon the public expression embodied in that vote.

compliance by any of those states. Additional justification can be found in the concurrent expression of the same obligation by other states which also proclaim their belief that they are bound by law to conduct themselves in the same manner. This analysis can be better understood through a systematic examination of its operation in relation to the generally accepted sources of international law.²¹

A. Treaties-The United Nations Charter

The most obvious way in which a General Assembly resolution can be linked with an unquestionably binding source of law is for it to elaborate in specific terms an obligation found in the United Nations Charter. The legal force of such an elaboration is analogous to the effect given generally to subsequent interpretations of a treaty. It can be argued that, insofar as a resolution deviates from the Charter's "original meaning," i.e., the interpretation reached if one ignores everything subsequent to signature, a later resolution has no binding effect, even on those parties who announced their belief that the resolution did in fact express their Charter obligation.²² The rationale for this emphasis on the original text is summed up in the following statement by Max Huber, which is cited with approval in the commentary to Articles 27 and 28 of the International Law Commission's Draft Articles on the Law of Treaties:

le texte signé est, sauf de rares exceptions, la seule et la plus récente expression de la volonté commune des parties.²³

But it is significant that the Draft Articles provide that, in interpreting a treaty, "there shall be taken into account, together with the context: (a) Any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty; . . ."²⁴ The Commission rejected proposals that the draft refer only to subsequent agreements between all the parties.²⁵ The Draft Articles actually exclude constitutive treaties because of their special character ²⁶ which, among other things, calls for an extra degree of latitude in giving effect to the subsequent practice and understandings that develop around such treaties.²⁷ This approach is desirable not only because the survival and effectiveness of the organization are often more important to the parties than their precise obligations under particular treaty provisions, but also because, by contrast with Huber's general statement, the members of an international organization are constantly in a position to elaborate and elucidate their common understanding through the pronouncements of their assemblies. General Assembly resolutions that declare the meaning of the Charter are one method of carrying on that process, and they should be accorded the weight that they deserve as an authoritative expression by the parties to a constitutive treaty of the scope and extent of their obligations under it.

What of the states that abstain or oppose the resolution in question? Abstention can be treated, without any injustice, as an acquiescence in the obligations specified, on the basis that any real objection could have been expressed by a negative vote, which was equally available to the abstaining state. A negative vote cannot in any sense be construed as an approval of the resolution. But that state might still be bound by the interpretation if it was a reasonable choice from among various rational alternatives.28 Since it is obvious that no linguistic expression can be clear in all its aspects and in relation to all its implications and all subsequent events, it must be assumed that a state agreeing to be bound by the terms of a constitutive instrument necessarily accepts the possibility that some of the subsequent interpretations will not be those that the state would have preferred, even though they were interpretations that it might have expected if it could have imagined the context in which they were made. Having chosen to bind itself by the Charter in spite of this awareness, the state must be held to subsequent reasonable interpretations of it. The fact that the particular interpretation which was ultimately adopted was not the one the objecting state had hoped for cannot be accepted as a basis for considering that state free from the effect of the interpretation.

B. Custom

Another source of law from which a General Assembly resolution may draw binding legal effect is customary international law. According to standard definitions ²⁰ a customary rule comes into existence only where there are acts of states in conformity with it, coupled with a belief that those acts are required by international law. In this context, General Assembly resolutions purporting to set out a customary rule of international law can serve several functions. First, a resolution declaring that a particular principle is binding as customary law supplies outstanding evidence of one of the requisites for the existence of such a rule: a belief on the part of states that they must behave according to its dictates. Together with prior or subsequent conforming conduct, the resolution "creates" a customary law by fulfilling the precondition of recognition.

A second and perhaps equally significant rôle for General Assembly resolutions is the clarification of the "acts" the rule is based upon. The series of phenomena which are the "acts" giving rise to a proscriptive or permissive custom may be susceptible of many interpretations, even when the diplomatic correspondence which usually attends them is taken into consideration. The significance of the custom growing out of the famous "Cutting Incident," ³² for example, has been deprecated by one writer on the ground that the arguments misconstrued or overlooked certain crucial aspects of the factual situation. ³³ A communal assessment of the facts of an "incident" and related state conduct could assist in crystallizing the rule.

Third, a resolution can deal with the intricacies and scope of a customary rule in a way that diplomatic correspondence is unlikely to do, because a

- 30 Bin Cheng, in "United Nations Resolutions on Outer Space: 'Instant' International Customary Law?'' 5 Indian Journal Int. Law 23 (1965), says (p. 36) that "there need . . . be no usage at all in the sense of repeated practice, provided that the opinio juris of the States concerned can be clearly established.'' He concludes that
- "8. Provided that the intention is expressed articulately and without ambiguity, there appears to be no reason why an Assembly resolution may not be used as a means for identifying the existence and contents of a new opinio juris." (P. 46.)
- $^{21}\,\mathrm{A}$ Memorandum by the Office of Legal Affairs, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/L.610 (1962), stated that
- "3. In United Nations practice, a declaration is a formal and solemn instrument, suitable for rare occasions when principles of great and lasting importance are being enunciated, such as the Declaration on Human Rights. A recommendation is less formal.
- "4. Apart from the distinction just indicated, there is probably no difference between a 'recommendation' or a 'declaration' in United Nations practice as far as strict legal principle is concerned. A 'declaration' or a 'recommendation' is adopted by resolution of a United Nations organ. As such it cannot be made binding upon Member States, in the sense that a treaty or convention is binding upon the parties to it, purely by the device of terming it a 'declaration' rather than a 'recommendation'. However, in view of the greater solemnity and significance of a 'declaration', it may be considered to impart, on behalf of the organ adopting it, a strong expectation that Members of the international community will abide by it. Consequently, in so far as the expectation is gradually justified by State practice, a declaration may by custom become recognized as laying down rules binding upon States.
- "5. In conclusion, it may be said that in United Nations practice, a 'declaration' is a solemn instrument resorted to only in very rare cases relating to matters of major and lasting importance where maximum compliance is expected." (Emphasis added.)

This concept can be substantially extended by taking into account past practice which conforms to the principles set forth in the resolution, as well as subsequent practice.

⁸² 2 Moore, Digest of International Law 231-240 (1906).

33 See Ebb, International Business Transactions 76-78 (1964). It may be that, whatever the actual nature of the facts, it is usually what the states thought took place that is crucial. But what happens to the customary rule when in a subsequent case a state points out that "the Emperor has no clothes"? Are either the actual events or the perceived outcomes customary law?

resolution will normally focus on the general principle and its application in future cases, rather than the concrete sets of past events which evoked the diplomatic concern. While the "core" or normal case may be thoroughly covered in diplomatic exchanges, various special situations and ramifications are likely to be left unexplored. An appropriate resolution can fill these gaps.

Fourth, a General Assembly resolution can express a consensus viewpoint. Although diplomatic correspondence often expresses the views of the parties involved in detail, and over a series of several disputes may result in the expression of opinion of a large number of states, such communication often lacks this one important element. A General Assembly resolution cannot merely state the conflicting precedents or views of various states on a particular matter. It must be so drafted that it can win the support of a majority of the Assembly, and in practice much more than a bare majority must be assured before a vote will be called. A resolution and the debate that precedes it can serve to harmonize conflicting views on both the facts and the law in a generally satisfactory way, producing a more valuable expression than the arguments of the parties alone.

States that abstain in the vote on a resolution declaring a rule of customary international law would certainly be considered to be bound by the resulting resolution, not only because they could have cast a negative vote, but also because tacit or presumed acceptance of a custom is an accepted element of this method of law-creation.³⁴ States opposing the resolution would be protected from the application of the custom to them, assuming that they had not by their previous acts either within or outside the United Nations already accepted the custom.³⁵

C. Other Sources

Another basic source of international law is "general principles of law recognized by civilized nations." Many of these principles relate primarily to matters of procedural fairness and the equitable behavior of the parties toward one another, at including such doctrines as "he who asks equity must do equity" as and res judicata. It is in the nature of some of these rules that they cannot readily be developed through state practice into customary law, because they serve primarily as guidelines for decision-making by impartial third parties. Whether one conceives of "general principles" as being principles recognized in the municipal law of the major legal systems of a common underlying sense of what is just in the circumstances," 41 one difficulty with their use is the absence of satisfactory evidence of the widespread acceptance of a given rule. A General Assembly resolution stating that a particular doctrine is accepted in every legal system substantially solves this problem by providing a formal expression by the members of the international community that they recognize the existence of the rule in their various legal systems. When such a resolution is supported by an overwhelming proportion of the states represented in the General Assembly, that statement itself demonstrates the general acceptance of the principle involved. The abstention or negative vote of a few states, at least where they were not the major representatives of a particular legal system, would not defeat the legal significance of the resolution for all of the community.

Decisions of the International Court of Justice are not formally binding "except between the parties and in respect of that particular case," 42 but a General Assembly resolution formally declaring the belief that an opinion of the Court did in fact articulate a generally accepted legal doctrine that bound all states, whether its origin were treaty, custom, or some other source, would provide a basis for reliance by Member States upon one another's assertions. This rationale would apply with equal force to advisory opinions of the Court. A similar argument, though perhaps slightly less persuasive, can be made with respect to "teachings of the most highly qualified publicists" which are formally adopted by a General Assembly resolution.

In summary, there are several ways in which a resolution, by being linked to one or more of the traditional sources of international law, can serve as a law-creating mechanism. A resolution can interpret the United Nations Charter or other treaty, accelerate the development and clarify the scope of a customary rule, or identify and authenticate a "general principle of law recognized by civilized nations." A resolution tied in this way to a traditional source of international law may reasonably be relied upon as a definitive statement of international law.

II. THE RÔLE OF RE-CITATION

Perhaps the greatest difficulty with the theoretical analysis presented above is the result it reaches. It proves too much to be politically acceptable. There are few states that would happily contemplate the prospect of finding themselves bound by the principles announced even in the General Assembly resolutions which they have supported over the years, let alone those resolutions on which they abstained or cast a negative vote. And it must be admitted that there might be an element of unfair surprise in holding a state, notwithstanding the bad faith inherent in its argument, bound by pronouncements that it believed were meaningless on the basis of the accepted legal doctrine of the time. The prospect of being required to comply with dozens of such resolutions, with sometimes haphazard and occasionally conflicting language, can be expected to arouse almost universal apprehension.

For legal purposes the argument would be couched in terms of the unreasonableness of the reliance by other states upon a single General Assembly resolution whose significance was not apparent. There are several ways of overcoming this contention. It is widely recognized that the subject matter of a resolution, the language of the title and operative paragraphs, and the comments of governments at the time of passage may separately or together give it special significance.43 This article will focus on another variable that may be able to effectively serve this function: the repeated subsequent citation of a particular resolution by the General Assembly. Continual reference to a resolution which declares that international law requires a given kind of conduct will impress the importance of the resolution upon all states and put them on notice of its potential legal relevance. The phenomenon of re-citation can distinguish significant resolutions from the thousands of others that the Assembly has passed in a period of over twenty years. In addition, the persistent re-citation of a given resolution indicates that it embodies a view of the community which has some continuity, rather than an ephemeral "accident" of General Assembly politics.

In considering the persuasiveness of this proposition, it is perhaps worthwhile to analogize this context to another realm in which re-citation is important: the citation by common-law courts of their previous opinions. The basic elements of similarity are easily seen. While the General Assembly structure mimies that of a legislative organ and while it often performs "legislative" functions, it also serves in a "judicial" capacity, dealing with particular disputes by means of fact-finding, law-formulation, and lawapplication. In both capacities, the General Assembly often refers to its previous resolutions, whether "legislative" or "judicial" in character. The presence of this phenomenon in the decision-making process of both the common-law courts and the General Assembly grows out of certain similarities in their decision-making process. Both institutions are continually faced with similar if not identical situations upon which antagonistic parties call for a pronouncement. In an effort to persuade the decision-makers to favor their respective positions, each party attempts to relate its preferred result to previous general statements of the same or related institutions.44 The elaboration of the decision, in response to these arguments, will naturally make reference to those previous pronouncements which support the decision-maker's result. These general statements may be either "legislative" or "judicial," in terms of their origin, breadth, and relation to a concrete case at the time of promulgation. To be worthy of citation, however, they must be of sufficient generality to be relevant to subsequent disputes and at the same time sufficiently precise that they cannot be invoked with equal persuasiveness by both antagonists in the dispute, in which case little is gained by the reference.

It may be argued that an important distinction between re-citation in General Assembly decisions and in common-law court decisions arises out of the fact that courts are bound to follow their previous precedents by the doctrine of stare decisis. But although this doctrine may affect the quantity of citations, from a realistic jurisprudential point of view it could as well be said that a case is law because it is cited, as that a case is cited because it is law. It is the later decision-maker who chooses to cite a particular previous decision, and stare decisis, at least for a court of last resort, has never been properly understood to mean more than an appropriate respect for the wisdom of earlier decisions and a concern for the expectations that they have generated.45 On the other hand, the technique of turning to prior decisions for guidance was widespread long before the doctrine of stare decisis was articulated,46 and its use far transcends the judicial context. The political organs of the United Nations have shown in their debates a deep concern for the significance of their previous decisions and the precedential value of the decision being made.4

Another arguable difference between General Assembly decisions and those of a municipal court is the fact that the General Assembly cannot always enforce its decisions, while a municipal court is more often capable of doing so. This difference is not crucial, since a court decision, while binding the parties to a given solution, may not effectively resolve the legal problems which gave rise to the dispute. The same issues may reappear before the court in substantially identical form between different parties and require reconsideration or further elaboration of the legal principles invoked in the earlier decision. Re-citation may also be symptomatic in either case of instances of non-compliance, but that does not by itself deprive a decision of its legal character.⁴⁸

The underlying rationale for differentiating frequently cited General Assembly resolutions is the increased reasonableness of the expectation that principles which have been often reiterated will be followed. Insofar as the analogy between court citation of previous decisions and General Assembly citation of previous resolutions is valid, one can conclude that the legal significance of a resolution correlates with subsequent citation in much the same way that the importance of a court decision is indicated by repeated reference to it in later opinions. The degree of expectation which has been generated in any given case will of course depend on a whole range of factors relating to the context of the original approval of the resolution as well as its re-citation. But continual re-citation by the General Assembly of certain principles that are described as binding obligations because of their roots in established sources of international law does serve to reinforce the claim that the particular resolution enunciates legally binding principles.

III. A FORAY INTO EMPIRICISM

Having constructed this theoretical foundation on which to build legal obligations out of certain resolutions of the General Assembly, it is appropriate to examine in some detail those resolutions which have been most cited in subsequent resolutions to see to what extent the practice can be related to the theory. Choosing the most-cited resolutions raises a methodological problem. The most obvious criterion, the gross number of citations, of necessity favors the older resolutions which, though referred to only occasionally in any one session, have over the years accumulated a large number of citations. Thus, of the eleven resolutions which have been cited over a dozen times, four (one third of the total) come from the first four sessions of the General Assembly and none come from the four most recent sessions studied (seventeen through twenty-one). On the other hand, selection on the basis of the most citations per session (including the session of passage) gives an unfair precedence to the more recent resolutions which, though they are cited relatively often now, may not stand the test of time. The reality of this concern is demonstrated by the fact that of the eleven resolutions which were cited an average of more than twice per session, four were passed in the twentieth or twenty-first sessions. It is difficult to believe that all of these resolutions will retain their places on this list by the end of the twenty-fifth or thirtieth session. A sort of de minimis rule can be invoked to arbitrarily exclude those resolutions which have been cited fewer than five times, regardless of their high averages, and replace them with the next-highest-ranking resolutions. tables that follow list the highest-ranking resolutions by each test: 49

Perhaps the first question that should be asked about this list of mostcited resolutions is whether the resolutions selected by this process appear to be of particular significance as a group. Examining the ten top-ranking resolutions (those above the broken lines), the answer seems to be a clear affirmative. First, as an indication of the non-random nature of the selection, it is worth noting that although 45% of the 2,247 resolutions ⁵⁰ passed by the General Assembly came from the Second (Economic and Financial),

50 The proportion of resolutions produced by the various committees of the General Assembly over the first 21 sessions is as follows:

First Committee	7.2%	Sixth Committee	7.7%
Second Committee	11.5%	Ad Hoc Political Committee *	3.0%
Third Committee	11.4%	Special Political Committee	2.2%
Fourth Committee	16.6%	No Committee	10.5%
Fifth Committee	25.7%	Other Committees	4.2%

^{*} After several years of existence as the Ad Hoc Political Committee, this committee was given permanent status as the Special Political Committee.

^{*}Brackets indicate resolutions excluded by the de minimis rule of five or more citations.

Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary), and Sixth (Legal) 51 Committees, none of the resolutions on this list were reported out by those committees. By contrast, four of these ten resolutions were approved without reference to any committee at all. Two came from the Third Committee, two from the Fourth Committee, and one each from the First and Ad Hoc Political Committees. Second, these ten resolutions deal with only four subjectmatter areas: the Palestine question, the question of South West Africa, human rights, and independence for colonial countries and peoples. These subjects are of course matters that have occupied a major portion of the time and energy of the General Assembly over the years, and all of them are live issues today.

More important for the purposes of this discussion is the extent to which these resolutions concern themselves with the assertion of rules of state behavior. Three of the resolutions are Declarations which lay down explicit rules in a legal format: Resolution 217(III)—An International Bill of Rights (The Universal Declaration of Human Rights); Resolution 1514(XV)—Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; and Resolution 1904(XVIII)—Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. The two resolutions on the Question of South West Africa 52 are devoted to setting out, formally accepting, and urging South Africa to accept, the International Court's Advisory Opinion on the International Status of South West Africa. 53 The five remaining resolutions cannot be fairly described as being primarily oriented toward the expression of legal principles. But two of these resolutions do refer to and apply juridical principles. Resolution 194(III) resolves that the Holy Places in Palestine "should be protected and free access to them assured, in accordance with existing rights and historical practice," 54 and that permanently displaced refugees should be compensated for losses "which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible.' '55 (Emphasis added.) Similarly, Resolution 2105(XX) describes the "dislocation, deportation and transfer of the indigenous inhabitants" as a "policy of violating the rights of colonial peoples" 56 and "Recognizes the legitimacy of the struggle by the peoples under colonial rule to exercise their right to self-determination and independence. . . . " 57

⁵¹ The absence of any resolutions from the Sixth Committee on this list is intriguing. Perhaps it can best be explained by the fact that one of its primary responsibilities is the development of the more traditional areas of international law, such as the law of the sea and diplomatic intercourse, by the more traditional means of preparing conventions for formal consideration. As a result it has involved itself in the least controversial rather than the most controversial areas of international law.

⁵⁵ Res. 194(III), par. 11. 56 Res. 2105(XX), par. 5.

⁵⁷ Ibid., par. 10.

(Emphasis added.) Significantly, in these statements, as in the resolutions devoted primarily to the expression of legal principles, an effort was made to invoke one or more of the traditional sources of international law, rather than to make bare assertions and give them independent legal force. Of the three remaining resolutions, two—Resolutions 1654(XVI) and 1810(XVII) ⁵⁸—are implementing supplements to Resolution 1514(XV), and Resolution 302(IV)—Assistance to Palestine Refugees—bears a similar relation to the portions of Resolution 194(III) dealing with the refugee problem. These resolutions were typically cited in conjunction with those more fundamental resolutions, and their importance is largely derived from the earlier, "lawgiving" pronouncements.

The summary analysis presented above indicates that the resolutions chosen on the basis of either most total citations or highest average citations per session do have a significant legal content. One of the most striking features of the two lists presented above is the fact that despite their opposite statistical biases (one favoring earlier resolutions, the other favoring more recent resolutions), there are four resolutions which rank high on both lists: Resolution 217(III)—the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; Resolution 749(VIII)—Question of South West Africa; Resolution 1514(XV)—Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; and Resolution 1654(XVI)—Situation with Regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. With respect to these resolutions, a more detailed analysis seems appropriate, dealing with five major questions:

- (1) What principles does the resolution assert?
- (2) Was the resolution when passed intended to express binding rules of law?
- (3) What was understood to be the source of those rules?
- (4) Do the subsequent citations of the resolution invoke it for the legal principles it asserts?
- (5) Based on the argument presented above, can the resolution be considered law today?

The answers to these questions seem most crucial in assessing the ultimate legal meaning of these resolutions.

IV. AN EXAMINATION OF THE MOST-CITED RESOLUTIONS

Resolution 217(III)—The Universal Declaration of Human Rights

The passage of Resolution 217(III) marked the first step in the program of the Commission on Human Rights of the Economic and Social Council. The Declaration was intended as a forerunner of an International Covenant of Human Rights being drafted by the Commission at a slower pace.⁵⁹ As such, and because it was not in treaty form, the Declaration was, in the view of one commentator, a "maximum program" of human rights, the scope of which would probably be significantly narrowed in the later covenant.⁶⁰ The Declaration set forth in thirty articles a basic enumeration of civil and political rights, the principles of non-discrimination because of race, religion or nationality, and the rights of participation in the economic, social and cultural benefits of the nation.

⁵⁸ Both Res. 1654(XVI) and Res. 1810(XVII) are titled: "The Situation with Regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples."

The introductory paragraph

Proclaims this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement . . . to the end that every individual and every organ of society . . . shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance. . . . 61

Without yet asking about the binding nature of the Declaration, it is apparent that it does not provide even in its language for the immediate vindication of these rights. Instead it calls for recognition and observance "by progressive measures." States are not asked to implement these guarantees within a specific period or even as quickly as possible. The one limitation on state action it does contain, by clear implication, is that the introduction of governmental policies directly antagonistic to these rights would be contrary to the call to progressively incorporate them into national law.

Even this requirement of movement in the direction of these guarantees is watered down by the provisions of Article 29, paragraph 2, which permit their limitation in order to protect the rights of others, and to meet "the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society." A provision of this kind necessarily allows governments a significant degree of freedom to curtail human rights in the face of real or perceived threats to the national welfare, and provides a potential defense to the claim that a state has violated the provisions of the Universal Declaration.

 - 61 The full paragraph is as follows:
- "Proclaims this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction."

The legal significance of the Declaration in the minds of those who approved it depends on what kinds of evidence are relied upon in reaching the conclusion. The formal statements made at the time of passage were typified by the statement of Mrs. Franklin Roosevelt, the representative of the United States and the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights:

In giving our approval to the Declaration today, it is of primary importance that we keep clearly in mind the basic character of the document. It is not a treaty; it is not an international agreement. . . . It is a declaration of basic principles of human rights and freedoms, to be stamped with the approval of the General Assembly by a formal vote of its members, and to serve as a common standard of achievement for all peoples of all nations.²²

On the other hand, several representatives indicated an intention to ascribe to the Declaration something more than a "purely optional significance," based on its relationship to the Charter and customary international law. ⁹³ Professor Lauterpacht, writing shortly after the passage of the Declaration, felt compelled to attack this aura of legal significance, apparently because he feared that romanticism on this point would tend to weaken the pressure for an indisputably binding covenant of human rights. ⁶⁴

Furthermore, the behavior of the Members in drafting and adopting the Declaration indicated a deep concern over its contents which is difficult to explain in terms other than their fear that it would in some way limit their freedom of action. For example, the presence of Article 29, paragraph 2, allowing for emergency situations, suggests that states were afraid to express these human rights in inflexible terms. Probably the most significant indication of this fear was the refusal of eight states to approve the Declaration. The eight abstaining states—the Eastern European states, Saudi Arabia, and the Union of South Africa—apparently felt that there

- "At the time when this article is being written it is not yet clear whether the Declaration will become a stepping-stone to a true Bill of Rights—that is what is meant by a covenant and provisions for implementation—or whether it will become a factor in causing the postponement or abandonment of the main instrument for which it was intended to pave the way. For although the Declaration can claim no legal authority and, probably, only inconsiderable moral authority, that circumstance does not deprive it altogether of significance or potential effect. Somewhat paradoxically, the realization of the ineffectiveness of the Declaration per se must tend to quicken the pace of less nominal measures for the protection of human rights."

was something to be lost by approving it, something more important than the propaganda benefits to be gained. Andrei Vishinsky, representing the U.S.S.R., said the Declaration "seems to support the view that the conception of sovereignty of governments was outdated." ⁶⁵ The delegate from South Africa explained its abstention by saying that the Declaration was being treated as if it created legal obligations for those who approved it. ⁶⁶ And while most of the articles were adopted unanimously, there were abstentions, varying in number from two to nine, in eight of the thirty-eight votes taken on the individual articles and preambular paragraphs. On Articles 14 and 20 there were also six and seven negative votes respectively. ⁶⁷

Finally, the Members had a foretaste of the way in which the Declaration would be invoked when, even before it was approved by the General Assembly, Chile protested the refusal of the Soviet Union to allow a Russian wife of a member of the Chilean Ambassador's family to emigrate to Chile with her husband. Chile, the United States, and the United Kingdom all invoked the relevant articles of the Declaration, not as a source of law per se, but as a statement of fundamental human rights which all states should recognize. In the context of our present international legal structure, it is not clear that invocation of a universally recognized rule of international law would have had a more persuasive effect. It can hardly be said that when the vote was taken in the General Assembly on the Declaration, the Members were unaware of its potential impact.

While the specific provisions of the Universal Declaration clearly are not drawn from the United Nations Charter itself, the Charter makes several references to human rights, and in Articles 55 and 56 requires the United Nations and Member States to promote "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." The term "human rights" is exactly the kind of phrase that is used in a constitutive document when it is expected that interpretation and elaboration will progress over a period of years: It invokes undefined standards instead of describing the required conduct in factually observable form. A reasonable and generally accepted definition and expansion of that term should result, therefore, in a set of principles which Member States are required by the Charter to promote. An examination of the procedure used in drafting the Universal Declaration reveals that an unexceptionable technique of elaboration was used: The source material for the provisions of the Declaration was the existing human rights provisions in national constitutions. The work of the Human Rights Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights was grounded in an outline draft prepared by the Secretariat with anno-tations to the constitutions of the Members of the United Nations. According to a State Department commentator, the draft "was designed to cover most of the rights commonly contained in constitutions of member states or in drafts of international bills of rights." To It could well be argued that the articles of the Declaration represented an elaboration of the Charter by means of "general principles of law recognized by civilized nations." It would be difficult for any Member State to argue that a definition of the Charter term "human rights" based on the rights guaranteed by Member State constitutions produced an arbitrary or unreasonable interpretation.

It is important to note, moreover, that while certain Eastern European Members abstained when the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was originally adopted, the final paragraph of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples ⁷¹ declares that all states "shall observe faithfully and strictly" the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Although several Western states abstained on that resolution, ⁷² those states favoring the resolution, including the Communist bloc, clearly expressed at that time their belief that the Universal Declaration must be complied with. This prescription was reiterated in similar language in the Declaration on Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, Resolution 1904(XVIII), which was approved unanimously.

Considering the references to "human rights" in the Charter, the drafting technique, the unanimous approval given to twenty-two of the thirty articles of the Declaration, and its adoption by every group of states but the Eastern European bloc, which originally objected on grounds other than the content of the substantive rights and which later approved it, it seems fair to say that the Universal Declaration does embody principles which are generally recognized in the laws of Member States and can serve as an accepted elaboration of the Charter language.

The Universal Declaration may also have significance from the point of view of customary international law. Admittedly, in 1948 there was no substantial practice of international diplomatic intervention in relation to the treatment which a state meted out to its own citizens, although the customary rules on state responsibility toward aliens contain principles which parallel some of the provisions of the Universal Declaration. But by 1968 a body of customary law may have developed around the Universal Declaration, which requires that states direct their energies toward the promotion of certain policies and the eradication of certain others. While a complete exploration of this possibility is not within the scope of this paper, the examination of citations of the Universal Declaration in the subsequent resolutions of the General Assembly will shed some light on one source of evidence for the proposition that the invocation of the Declaration by states in relation to particular concrete situations and policies has given rise to a custom based on the principles found in the Universal Declaration.

The 75 citations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights appear in a variety of contexts, from a resolution on interference with radio signals 73 to one on the world campaign for literacy. 74 The Declaration has been cited in every session but the non-voting Nineteenth, and it was cited at least four times in every session (again excluding the Nineteenth) from the Fifteenth Session to the Twenty-First Session. 75 The major focal points have been declarations and conventions in the field of human rights, 76 resolutions dealing with colonialism, 77 and resolutions on conditions in South Africa and South West Africa. Of this last group, four deal with apartheid in South Africa, 78 nine deal with discrimination against people of Indian origin in South Africa, 79 and six deal with South West Africa. 80 An example of this kind of citation is paragraph 6 of Resolution 1663(XVI):

6. Reaffirms that the racial policies being pursued by the Government of South Africa are a flagrant violation of the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and are totally inconsistent with South Africa's obligations as a member state.

Other citations relating to specific claims of violation of human rights involve the Soviet wives ease, discussed above, and the Tibet Question.³¹

In 14 resolutions a specific article of the Universal Declaration was cited, and in four of those resolutions the cited article was quoted either in full or in substantial part.82 Six of the 14 citing resolutions (and three of the four quoting resolutions) related to either presentation of a convention for signature and ratification or a Declaration on some specific area of human rights by the General Assembly. Only one of the 14 resolutions was concerned with judging whether the conduct of a specific country or group of countries constituted a violation of the principles of the Universal Declaration: Resolution 285(III)-Violation by the U.S.S.R. of Fundamental Human Rights, Traditional Diplomatic Practices and Other Principles of the Charter. Except for this early case, in which the denial of rights was more directly connected to international relations than normally, no resolution has formally pronounced that the conduct of a specific state was contrary to the provisions of a specific article of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. While the contexts of these resolutions normally leave little doubt about which articles of the Universal Declaration are involved, condemnations of this kind have refrained from invoking them specifically, and have chosen instead to cite the Declaration generally, often in conjunction with an equally general reference to the Charter.

There can be no question that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has had a seminal influence on the entire field of human rights from the programs of the United Nations system to the series of declarations and multilateral conventions which have been drafted in the twenty years since it was approved by the General Assembly. Its direct legal significance is not quite so clear. The formal expressions of many of the Member States at the time of its approval and the degree to which its principles expand the pre-existing conventional and customary international law tend to militate against its recognition as a limitation on state conduct with which compliance can reasonably be expected and demanded. On the other hand, the nature of the drafting process and the attitudes taken by the Member States toward that process, the relation of the Declaration to the provisions of the Charter and the constitutions of the Member States, and the repeated invocation of the Declaration both as an inspiration for subsequent pronouncements on human rights and as a measure of the conduct of various states, all indicate that the provisions of the Declaration can be reasonably expected to control, within the stated limits, the scope of state conduct in the field of human rights. Looking back on the multitude of statements of human rights prepared by the General Assembly that have drawn upon the Universal Declaration, as well as its continued invocation in conjunction with Articles 55 and 56 of the United Nations Charter, it seems ever more apparent that the Universal Declaration is in fact an authoritative interpretation of the term "human rights" which appears throughout the Charter. Although the recent completion of the International Covenants on Human Rights may be viewed as an indication that the Member States did not consider the Universal Declaration as expressing a binding obligation, there are sufficient points of difference in both substance and implementing machinery to make the existence of overlapping obligations perfectly plausible.⁸³ And there can be no question that the obligations contained in the United Nations Charter are unaffected by the presentation and signature of the International Covenants.

Furthermore, the repeated invocation of the Declaration as a standard of conduct in specific situations has crystallized a custom that certain approaches to the matter of human rights are unacceptable to the world community. In this context it is important to recall that the Declaration itself does not provide for the immediate implementation of these rights. Instead it calls upon states to pursue a path designed to attain them. The intense and virtually unanimous condemnation of South Africa, which has ignored this injunction and deviated onto a contrary course, has been reinforced by action; it has paid a price in diplomatic isolation and economic sanctions as great as that which is typically imposed for violation of universally accepted principles of international law. The extent to which the Declaration has been responsible for conforming national conduct can never be known, but the willingness of states to impose the traditional international law sanctions upon those states which refuse to conform indicates the earnestness of the community's belief that movement in a direction contrary to the principles spelled out in the Declaration is unlawful.

Resolution 749 (VIII)—Question of South West Africa

Resolution 749 was one of a long series of resolutions attempting to bring South West Africa under the effective supervision of the international community. It marked a turning point in the United Nations approach, resulting from the fact that negotiations between South Africa and the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, established by Resolution 449(V), on the conditions for United Nations supervision of the Mandate, had completely broken down, and the General Assembly was establishing by Resolution 749(VIII) a Committee on South West Africa to hear petitions and gather information on South West Africa without South Africa's co-operation.⁸⁴ In doing so, the resolution sets out a series of legal propositions which invoke the conclusions of the International Court in its Advisory Opinion on the International Status of South West Africa so as a basis for establishing the Committee on South West Africa and authorizing it to gather data and hear petitions on the situation in South West Africa. The content of these principles, some of which appear in the body of the resolution, some in the preamble, and some in both, can be summarized as follows:

⁸³ The simultaneous existence and effectiveness of several overlapping treaties is not unusual. See, for example, the list of treaties on white slave traffic and on narcotic drugs in the List of Signatures, Ratifications, Accessions, etc. of Multilateral Treaties in Respect of which the Secretary-General Performs Depositary Functions, U.N. Doc. ST/LEG/SER.D/1 (1968).

⁸⁴ A short summary of the history of the negotiations can be found in Sohn, United Nations Law 694-699 (1st ed., 1956).

- South West Africa is a Territory under the Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa;
- (2) The Union of South Africa cannot modify the status of South West Africa without United Nations consent;
- (3) The Union of South Africa is obligated to carry out its duties under Article 22 of the League of Nations Covenant, and to submit information and petitions to the United Nations;
- (4) The International Court of Justice has compulsory jurisdiction over disputes related to the Mandate under Article 7 of the Mandate;
- (5) The United Nations has an obligation to the inhabitants of South West Africa to exercise its supervisory powers on their behalf; and
- (6) The normal way of modifying the status of South West Africa would be to place it under the Trusteeship System.⁸⁰
- 86 The relevant portions of Res. 749 (VIII) are the following paragraphs:
- "The General Assembly,
- "Having accepted, by resolution 449 A (V) of 13 December 1950 and by resolution 570 (VI) of 19 January 1952, the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to South West Africa,
- "Recalling that the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to the Territory of South West Africa sets forth, inter alia, that:
- "(a) The Territory of South West Africa is a Territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920,
- "(b) The Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa, and that the comptence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations,
- "(c) The Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations stated in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South West Africa as well as the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of that Territory, the supervisory functions to be exercised by the United Nations to which the annual reports and the petitions are to be submitted;
- "Considering that, in accordance with the opinion of the International Court of Justice, the Union of South Africa is under an obligation to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court as provided by Article 37 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, by Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations and by article 7 of the Mandate for South West Africa,
- "10. Considers that without United Nations supervision the inhabitants of the Territory are deprived of the international supervision envisaged by the Covenant of the League of Nations:
- "11. Believes that it would not fulfill its obligation towards the inhabitants of South West Africa if it were not to assume the supervisory responsibilities with regard to the Territory of South West Africa which were formerly exercised by the League of Nations;

The language of the resolution, as well as the context of its passage, leaves no doubt that these propositions are intended to express positive legal obligations of South Africa and the United Nations. It is couched in terms of present-tense, unconditional verbs, with liberal use of such phrases as "competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa" and "obligation to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court."

Resolution 749(VIII) was not the first resolution to concern itself with the conclusions reached by the International Court in this opinion on South West Africa. Five of the propositions set forth above had been previously stated in very similar terms in Resolution 449(V), which was passed immediately after the Court announced its decision. The resolutions are not precisely identical, however, in their statement of the relevant legal prin-The earlier resolution makes slightly more elaborate reference to the substantive duties of the Mandatory toward the inhabitants of South West Africa, noting the obligation to promote to the utmost the "material and moral well-being and social progress of its inhabitants."87 More significantly, Resolution 449(V) makes no reference to the fifth item above, the obligation of the United Nations to supervise the conduct of the Mandatory Power. This principle was particularly important in light of the General Assembly's more militant approach to supervision of the Mandate. The General Assembly apparently chose to reiterate the conclusions of the International Court of Justice in positive terms, rather than merely to refer to Resolution 449(V), in order to generate support for its broad definition of the authority of the Committee on South West Africa.

[&]quot;The General Assembly,

[&]quot;Having accepted, by resolution 449 A (V) of 13 December 1950, the advisory opinion of 11 July 1950 of the International Court of Justice concerning South West Africa, inter alia, to the effect that:

[&]quot;(a) While 'the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter do not impose on the Union of South Africa a legal obligation to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System', they 'are applicable to the Territory of South West Africa in the sense that they provide a means by which the Territory may be brought under the Trusteeship System',

[&]quot;(b) ... the Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa,' and ... the competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations', [&]quot;2. Reasserts that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory would be to place it under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter."

⁸⁷ Res. 449(A)(V), seventh preambular paragraph:

[&]quot;Considering that it is incumbent upon the Government of the Union of South Africa to promote to the utmost in the administration of the Territory the material and moral well-being and social progress of its inhabitants as a sacred trust of civilization, subject to the existing Mandate, and to give effect to the obligations which it assumed under the Mandate."

[Vol. 63]

The source of the legal principles expressed by Resolution 749 (VIII) is of course the Advisory Opinion of the International Court, which in turn derived its conclusions from the Covenant of the League of Nations, the United Nations Charter, the Mandate Agreement, and the statements and actions of South Africa. In many respects the resolution's provisions are literal or nearly literal restatements of the Court's opinion. It must be recognized, however, that even what is apparently a bare restatement of the law inevitably introduces variations. The most obvious change found in Resolution 749 (VIII) involves the assertion by the General Assembly that the United Nations has an obligation to the inhabitants of the Territory to exercise international supervision over the conduct of the Mandatory Power. The Opinion of the International Court discusses the transfer of supervisory powers from the League of Nations to the United Nations, and the "sacred trust" underlying the Mandate System.88 But nowhere does it express the view that these supervisory powers give rise to supervisory responsibilities of the international agency to fully exercise those powers on behalf of the inhabitants of the Mandated Territory. There can be no doubt that the powers were provided with the purpose that they would be exercised, but the General Assembly was elaborating a previously unarticulated principle when it asserted the Organization's duty to act.

Another interpretation appears in the resolution in the guise of a restatement of the Court's Opinion. The resolution "Reasserts that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory would be to place it under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter." This very language appears in the Opinion of the International Court. But it is a gloss of a fuller, and somewhat weaker, expression of the Court's views presented on the previous page of the Opinion:

It is true that, while Members of the League of Nations regarded the Mandates System as the best method for discharging the sacred trust of civilization provided for in Article 22 of the Covenant, the Members of the United Nations considered the International Trusteeship System to be the best method for discharging a similar mission. It is equally true that the Charter has contemplated and regulated only a single system, the International Trusteeship System. It did not contemplate or regulate a co-existing Mandates System. It may thus be concluded that it was expected that the mandatory States would follow the normal course indicated by the Charter, namely, conclude Trusteeship Agreements. The Court is, however, unable to deduce from these general considerations any legal obligation for mandatory States to conclude or to negotiate such agreements. It is not for the Court to pronounce on the political or moral duties which these considerations may involve.

For these reasons, the Court considers that the Charter does not impose on the Union an obligation to place South-West Africa under the Trusteeship System. O

The Court's more direct language should properly be read in conjunction with this more elaborate statement of its views. The General Assembly, by choosing the more forceful statement and putting it forward as the Court's determination, is strengthening the decision by merely repeating a selected portion verbatim.⁹¹

An examination of the resolutions in which Resolution 749 (VIII) has been cited highlights the significance of the fact that the original elaboration of all but one of these legal principles is found in Resolution 449(V). Of the 34 references, 16 are for the purpose of noting the fact that Resolution 749(VIII) authorized the Committee on South West Africa to hear petitions from individuals residing in the Territory.92 Six more resolutions refer to Resolution 749(VIII) in relation to its instruction to the Committee to make reports to the General Assembly about conditions in the Territory,93 one more in relation to the composition of the Committee.94 Much of the justification for these authorizations of Committee action comes from the one principle found in Resolution 749 (VIII) that is not present in Resolution 449 (VIII): the obligation of the United Nations to exercise its supervisory powers on behalf of the inhabitants of the Territory. By contrast, where the intention in the citing resolution was to reinforce the other principles contained in Resolution 749 (VIII), the General Assembly invoked Resolution 449(V), the resolution passed in direct response to the opinion of the International Court. All but 3 of the 20 references to that resolution serve the purpose of drawing attention to the opinion of the International Court and the acceptance of that opinion by the General Assembly. Resolution 904(IX) clearly makes this distinction by invoking Resolution 449(V) on the point of acceptance of the Court opinion and Resolution 749 (VIII) on the United Nations supervisory obligation. While six resolutions cite Resolution 749 (VIII) for the proposition that the normal way of modifying South West Africa's status would be to place it under the Trusteeship System, all cite Resolution 449(V) as well, and five of those resolutions also make reference to the General Assembly's acceptance of the I.C.J. Advisory Opinion by Resolution 449(V).95 The most recent citations of Resolution 749(VIII) were in Resolutions 1702(XVI) (transferring the duties of the Committee on South West Africa to a new United Nations Special Committee for South West Africa), 1703(XVI) (condemning South African violations of the Mandate, in response to petitions heard by the Committee on South West Africa), and 1704(XVI)

⁹¹ Res. 449(V) and 749(VIII) also give the impression that they are repeating the language of previous resolutions in making this statement. But the resolutions passed before the I.C.J. Advisory Opinion have no linguistic similarity to this provision, and they have no normative quality. Instead they simply recommend that South West Africa be placed under the Trusteeship System.

(dissolving the Committee on South West Africa), passed at the Sixteenth Session of the Assembly. Resolution 449(V) was cited only once after that time, in Resolution 2145 (XXI), which terminated the Mandate for South West Africa. The thrust of these resolutions merged into the general call to abolish colonialism enunciated in Resolution 1514(XV).

An evaluation of the legal significance of Resolution 749 (VIII) in light of its frequent re-citation must begin with a recognition of the fact that much of the content of the resolution is in fact a repetition of the principles announced in Resolution 449(V). The one rule announced by the resolution which was not found in Resolution 449(V), and the one for which the resolution was most often cited, was that the United Nations had an obligation to exercise its supervisory powers over the conduct of the Mandatory Power. The power and the duty to exercise it were invoked by the international community through the United Nations on numerous occasions over the years, in both the General Assembly and the International Court.90 Although South Africa never accepted the proposition, this interpretation of its treaty obligations was almost universally accepted and acted upon by the international community. The exercise of this power by the United Nations in fulfillment of its responsibilities had developed into a fixed expectation on the part of all states, including South Africa. After a few years the regular objection by South Africa was no longer taken seriously. The constant invocation of Resolution 749 (VIII) and its overwhelming approval by the General Assembly left no significant doubt that it was considered the law by the international community.

Resolution 1514(XV)—Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples

Resolution 1514(XV), the most cited resolution of the General Assembly, grew out of a proposal presented to the General Assembly by Nikita Khrushchev, the Premier of the U.S.S.R., in his address to the General Assembly on September 23, 1960. The Soviet draft itself was ultimately voted down, but the 43-nation draft which finally passed by a vote of 89-0, with 9 abstentions, was similar in many respects.97 The resolution was never referred to a General Assembly committee. Its substantive provisions, set out in numbered paragraphs in the body of the resolution, can be summarized as follows:

- (1) Colonial rule is unlawful.
- (2) All peoples have the right to determine freely their political status and pursue their economic, social, and cultural development.
- (3) Unpreparedness should not be used as a pretext for delaying independence.

26 South West Africa-Voting Procedure, Advisory Opinion, [1955] I.C.J. Rep. 67, 49 A.J.I.L. 565 (1955); Admissibility of Hearings of Petitioners by the Committee on South West Africa, Advisory Opinion, [1956] I.C.J. Rep. 23, 50 A.J.I.L. 954 (1956).

97 A summary of the history of Res. 1514(XV) can be found in 1960 U.N. Yearbook 44-50. The nine states abstaining were Australia, Belgium, Dominican Republic, France, Portugal, Spain, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, and United States.

- (4) Forcible measures to maintain colonialism shall cease.
- (5) Immediate steps shall be taken to transfer all powers to the indigenous inhabitants.
- (6) Disruption of the national unity or territorial integrity of a country is unlawful.98

These six paragraphs were followed by a seventh, which makes clear the intention of the drafters that the resolution be considered a declaration of binding rules of law:

7. All states shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the present Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity.

The language of the resolution is of a normative character throughout. Paragraphs 1 and 6 describe activities which are respectively "contrary to" and "incompatible with" the United Nations Charter. Paragraphs 4 and 5 provide respectively that certain actions "shall cease" and that certain others "shall be taken." Paragraph 2 speaks of "the right to self-determination," and paragraph 3 provides that certain matters "should never serve as a pretext" for delay.

The apparent source of the rules set out in the Declaration is the United Nations Charter itself. Paragraph 2 above can be derived from Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter, which describes one of the purposes of the United Nations to be "To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples . . . ," and Article 55, which also refers to "equal rights and

- 98 The full text of these paragraphs is as follows:
- "1. The subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation.
- "2. All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.
- "3. Inadequacy of political, economic, social, or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.
- "4. All armed action or repressive measures of all kinds directed against dependent peoples shall cease in order to enable them to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence, and the integrity of their national territory shall be respected.
- "5. Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.
- "6. Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.
- "7. All States shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the present Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity."

self-determination of peoples." Paragraph 3 of the Declaration, insofar as its use of the word "pretext" implies a lack of good faith on the part of the colonial Power, can be linked to Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Charter, which requires good faith fulfillment of Charter obligations. Paragraph 4, which deals with the cessation of repressive measures, can be tied to Article 73, paragraph a, which requires that the colonial Power ensure the "just treatment" and "protection against abuses" of the inhabitants. Paragraph 5, which calls for immediate steps to transfer power to the peoples of the territories, grows out of the requirement of Article 73, paragraph b, that the colonial Power "assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions." Similarly, paragraph 6 of the Declaration, which attacks the disruption of "the national unity or the territorial integrity of a country," can be derived from Article 73, paragraphs a and b, in their references to "due respect for the culture of the peoples." Paragraph 1 of the Declaration stands essentially as a derivation of a general principle from the specifics of the subsequent paragraphs, stating the conclusion to be drawn from them: Colonialism is unlawful.

There can be no question, of course, that Resolution 1514(XV) does far more than simply restate the norms set forth in the Charter. Goodrich and Hambro report that at the San Francisco Conference a Chinese amendment to the draft of Article 73 that would have obligated colonial Powers "to promote development toward independence or self-government as may be appropriate" was withdrawn after some consideration. 99 Similarly, they comment that the inclusion of a reference to self-determination in Article 1, paragraph 2, was "not intended to encourage demands for immediate independence or movements for secession." 100 Resolution 1514(XV) was not completely without connection to previous developments under the Charter, however. As early as the Seventh Session, the General Assembly in Resolution 637 (VII) called upon all states to "recognize and promote the realization of the right of self-determination of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories" by ascertaining the wishes of the people "through plebiscites or other democratic means, preferably under the auspices of the United Nations." In part B of that resolution it recommended that colonial Powers "voluntarily include in the information transmitted by them under Article 73 e of the Charter details regarding the extent to which the right of peoples and nations to self-determination is exercised by the peoples of those Territories . . . "; and in part C asked the Economic and Social Council to recommend steps which might be taken by the United Nations "to develop international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination." Resolution 1514(XV), while it marked a major step, was not an unprecedented plunge into an area new to the General Assembly or the United Nations Charter.101

Subsequent citations of the resolution are ubiquitous; 13%, better than one in eight, of the resolutions passed since December 14, 1960, have made reference to it. Furthermore, these references gave no sign of tapering off in the period through the 21st Session. There were more citations in the 20th Session than any other, and the 21st Session cited it more often than the 17th, 18th, or 19th Sessions. 102 Nine of the 95 citations are found in resolutions dealing with further elaborations of the obligations of colonial Powers and/or machinery to implement the provisions of these resolutions. An additional nine are concerned with human rights problems and programs, and 14 more relate to economic and social programs such as training for indigenous peoples, literacy, economic development, and dissemination of information about the United Nations and its resolutions on colonialism. Most significantly, 63 of the 95 citations occur in resolutions concerned with the progress of a specific colony or group of colonies toward the goals set out in Resolution 1514(XV). This continual re-citation of the resolution, which establishes general rules on the conduct of colonial Powers, in the context of review of the developments in specific colonies has the earmarks of a traditional law-applying process, in which a general standard is used as the basis for judging individual conduct.

On 33 occasions the General Assembly has adverted to a specific paragraph of Resolution 1514(XV) in a subsequent resolution. Citations by paragraph number appear four times; quotations, five times. The most common type of reference, however, was to refer generally to the resolution in support of a legal proposition which is a virtual quotation of a specific paragraph of Resolution 1514(XV); for example: "5. Considers that any attempt to partition the territory or to take any unilateral action, directly or indirectly, preparatory thereto constitutes a violation of the Mandate and of Resolution 1514(XV)." While this type of reference involves neither explicit citation nor quotation of the particular paragraph, the closeness of the paraphrasing typically leaves little doubt as to the

18	16

The lack of citations in the 19th Session is of course an outgrowth of the U.N. financing crisis, which prevented voting on any controversial questions.

103 Because some resolutions contain more than one such reference, there are only 24 resolutions in which this type of citation occurs.

104 Explicit reference to a particular paragraph can be found in Res. 1654(XVI) (pars. 4 and 6), 1747(XVI) (par. 5), and 1955(XVIII) (par. 5). Quotation of a specific paragraph is found in Res. 1603(XV) (pars. 1 and 5), 1650(XVI) (par. 4), 1654(XVI) (par. 5), and 1951(XVIII) (par. 5).

derivation of the statement.¹⁰⁶ In these situations the General Assembly is definitely using Resolution 1514(XV) as a source, not merely for the generalized proposition that colonialism is undesirable, but for the more specific rules of conduct which it sets out.

Of all of the resolutions of the General Assembly, Resolution 1514(XV) seems most closely to approximate a lawmaking act whose content grows out of Article 1, paragraph 2, Article 55, and Article 73 of the United Nations Charter. While none of those provisions called for the abolition of the colonial system, they contained the seeds of its eventual condemnation. The goal of self-determination of peoples, the obligation to promote international economic and social progress, and the duty to assist non-selfgoverning territories "in the progressive development of free political institutions" forewarned an eventual call for independence. After fifteen years had passed, and given the progress of those who co-operated with those goals, it was not unreasonable for the international community to conclude that those colonial Powers which showed no progress toward these ends were not fully meeting their Charter obligations. By the same token, those who signed the Charter, even if they voted against Resolution 1514 (XV), would be hard pressed to honestly affirm that it was not a reasonably foreseeable interpretation of their obligations after the passage of several

The language and the circumstances of the passage of Resolution 1514(XV), set out briefly above, indicate that the resolution was intended to set out a binding interpretation of the Charter, and the continual re-citation and other actions of the General Assembly in support of the resolution display the seriousness of the belief. The establishment of a Special Committee on the situation with regard to the implementation of Resolution 1514(XV) by Resolution 1654(XVI) 107 began a process of United Nations investigation into colonial situations and bilateral and multilateral political pressure of an intensity which is not always seen in enforcing universally accepted principles of international law. While one writer has concluded that, at least as of 1964 when he wrote, "The failure of the Organization to impose its will on recalcitrant Members shows the ineffectiveness of resolutions [like Resolution 1514(XV)]," 108 one might suggest that the results achieved by the United Nations in this area compare favorably with those, for example, of the United States Government in its efforts to desegregate American schools. Such major social changes are not accomplished overnight. The continual re-citation of the resolution has given rise, along with other factors, to a fixed and universal expectation that the international community considers colonialism unacceptable, and will take steps to terminate existing colonial regimes and to prevent the creation of any new colonial territories. No state could honestly claim that it was unaware of this expectation or that the resolution was merely a "recommendation" with no normative force as an authoritative interpretation of the United Nations Charter, and few colonial Powers have attempted to permanently obstruct decolonization. In short, Resolution 1514(XV) is as much a part of our international law as any of the familiar traditional doctrines.

Resolution 1654(XVI)—The Situation with Regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples

Resolution 1654(XVI) was passed by the General Assembly for the purpose of implementing the "objectives and principles" established in Resolution 1514(XV). The item was originally placed on the General Assembly agenda by the Soviet Union with the explanation that, despite the passage of the Declaration on Granting Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples nine months earlier, 70 million people remained under colonial rule. The Soviet draft resolution called for the establishment of a commission to inquire into the situation and for the complete liquidation of colonialism by the end of 1962. The Assembly ultimately approved a 38-Power draft, without two amendments proposed by the Soviet Union, by a vote of 97-0, with four recorded abstentions. A Nigerian draft resolution calling for the end of colonialism before December 1, 1970, was withdrawn after the passage of the 38-Power draft.

The content of Resolution 1654(XVI) clearly indicates that it was not designed to announce any principles of law, but to set up machinery to deal with colonialism. Paragraph 1 "Solemnly reiterates and reaffirms" Resolution 1514(XV), and paragraph 2 "Calls upon States concerned to take action without further delay" to apply the Declaration. The remaining seven paragraphs establish a Special Committee and describe its duties and powers. The purpose of the Committee is "to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration" and to make periodic reports to the General Assembly.¹¹¹

Similarly, subsequent references to Resolution 1654(XVI) indicate that it does not have the character of a statement of substantive legal principles.

23 of the 24 citations occurred in conjunction with Resolution 1514(XV).¹¹² The 14 resolutions that focus on specific colonies all draw their general principles from Resolution 1514(XV), and the references to Resolution 1654(XVI) are actually concerned with the reports on those colonies made by the Special Committee.¹¹³ Six of the resolutions citing Resolution 1654(XVI) are concerned with the relationship between the Special Committee and other General Assembly committees.¹¹⁴ Four citing resolutions deal with the general problem of decolonization,¹¹⁵ and in each case the reference to Resolution 1654(XVI) is solely concerned with the activities of the Special Committee, while substantive principles are derived from Resolution 1514(XV) or other sources.

From what has been said, it is clear that Resolution 1654(XVI) does not set forth binding principles of international law, nor was it intended to do so. Its frequent reiteration by the General Assembly does not indicate that the Assembly is invoking it for the principles it contains; on the contrary, it is cited essentially as an adjunct to Resolution 1514(XV). Why then the reiteration? Perhaps because the unwillingness of certain states to accept the principles laid down in Resolution 1514(XV) manifested itself in the form of a refusal by those states to co-operate with the Special Committee established by Resolution 1654(XVI). Thus the action of the General Assembly of re-citing Resolution 1654(XVI) with the purpose of encouraging co-operation with the Special Committee was in effect a means of pressuring recalcitrant states to accept the principles of Resolution 1514(XV). The battle over the Declaration is being fought in part on the issue of co-operation with the Special Committee. Or perhaps it was simply a desire of the draftsmen to cite as many resolutions as possible in their later resolutions, in the hope of exploiting whatever additional moral force might be gained from doing so. Whatever the motive, it has more to do with the lawmaking character of Resolution 1514(XV) than with any substantive principles that might be gleaned from Resolution 1654(XVI).

V. Some Conclusions

Examination of the recognized processes for the creation of international law reveals several means of using General Assembly resolutions as a law-making vehicle. A resolution can serve as an authoritative interpretation of the United Nations Charter, as an expression of the community's belief that certain conduct is required by customary law, or as a determination that certain rules are "general principles of law recognized by civilized nations." The lawmaking character of this type of resolution arises not from the formal powers of the General Assembly, but from the reasonableness of the expectation that states which have collectively expressed the view that the law requires certain conduct will act in accordance with that expression.

In this context, the repeated reference by the General Assembly to certain previous resolutions as a standard by which to judge the behavior of a specific state, or as an expression of principles which should be respected by all states, reinforces the expectation that those principles will in fact be followed. This process of re-citation distinguishes those resolutions which express deeply-held, temporally stable convictions from those which are of only passing or mild concern. The extent of re-citation which is required to solidify a specific principle into a rule of law will depend upon the language of the resolution, the motives that lead to its passage, the contexts in which it is re-cited, and a host of other factors.

When the empirical data on re-citation of resolutions by the General Assembly are examined, the difficulty of the question of whether the frequently cited resolutions have become binding law becomes apparent. Of the four most cited resolutions, one, Resolution 1654(XVI), appears not to have the appropriate content for this purpose, and it is cited only to reaffirm the competence of the United Nations to act through subordinate committees on questions of colonialism. Similarly, Resolution 749(VIII) is not primarily cited for the legal principles it announces. It does establish the principle that the United Nations is obligated to act on behalf of the people of South West Africa, but that obligation was certainly not one that a majority of the General Assembly was reluctant to undertake.

Resolutions 217(III) and 1514(XV), on the other hand, do appear to have attained, or at least progressed well down the road toward attaining, the status of accepted principles of international law. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights sets out a series of principles which elaborate and clarify the concept of "human rights" referred to in the Charter, and calls upon all states, as does the Charter, to move toward the implementation of those rights. While South Africa has refused, despite rising pressure, to accept even the ultimate desirability of these principles, and only minimal progress has been achieved in some other states, immediate implementation is clearly not the crucial test of the obligatory nature of a principle of international law. In fact, some of the traditional enforcement mechanisms of international law have already been invoked in support of the Universal Declaration. Resolution 1514(XV) most explicitly declares that the principles it promulgates are to be "faithfully and strictly" observed. Again, while colonialism has not been eradicated throughout the world in the years since its passage, a great deal of progress has been made in that direction. Substantial energy has been devoted toward its implementation, and there can be little doubt that colonialism is well on its way toward complete and permanent eradication.

Despite these rather positive conclusions about the lawmaking significance of continually re-cited General Assembly resolutions, it is fair to say that the General Assembly has not yet really tried to exercise its quasi-legislative powers. Only recently, in Resolution 1514(XV), has the Assembly formally expressed the view that a resolution must be observed by all Member States, and it has yet to detail in a resolution what it believes to be the source of such an obligation. Similarly, the Assembly has only rarely taken advantage of the opportunity to cite a specific paragraph or article of a lawmaking resolution in connection with a specific case in which a violation is considered to have taken place. And it has never formally expressed the view in a resolution that an earlier resolution being cited stated a binding principle of international law. When and if the General Assembly does begin to exercise its full lawmaking potential, a resolution of the following variety may appear:

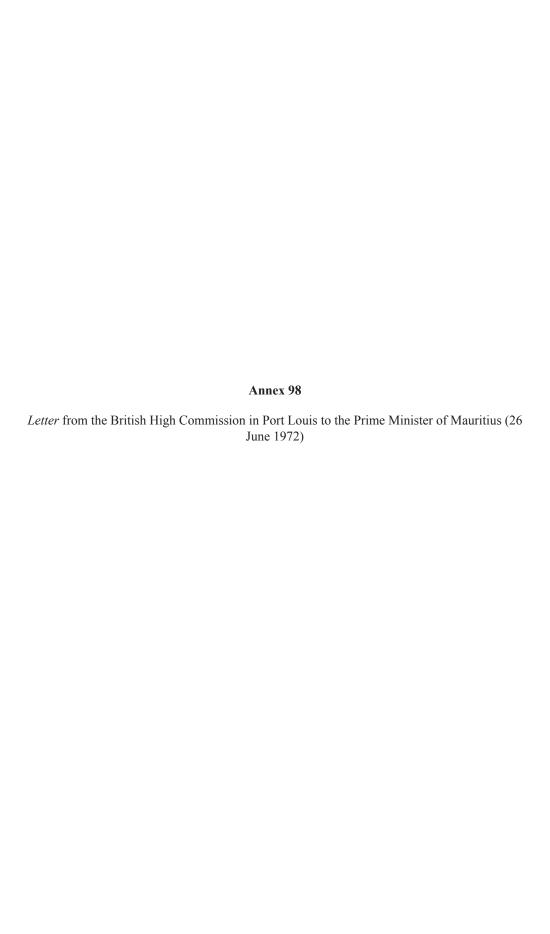

The General Assembly,

Convinced that Resolution — declares in paragraph — a principle of customary international law which is evidenced by the Case of the — and by the — Incident,

Recognizing that the recent events involving State X have created a situation which Resolution ————, paragraph —, was intended to govern,

- 1. Reaffirms that Resolution is an accurate and complete expression of the scope and extent of the rule that and that all states are legally bound to conform to that rule as it is there set forth;
- 2. Determines that State X has acted in a manner contrary to the requirements of paragraph of Resolution ————;
- 3. Calls upon State X to act in accordance with this international principle in the interests of international peace and security, and justice.

It may be that it is impossible in the present world condition for the General Assembly to pass a resolution in this form. If that is the case, the General Assembly will simply continue to legislate by the slower, less precise, and more invisible technique presently being employed. Member States might seriously consider, however, whether this more haphazard process might not in the long run create more dangers of undesirable "legislation" than would frank recognition and careful control of the mechanisms by which the General Assembly creates international law.

I refer to the meeting in London on 23 February, 1972, between yourself, Sir Harold Walter and Lord Lothian, and to your meeting with Baroness Tweedsmuir on 23 June, 1972, at which the Mauritius Government scheme for the resettlement of the persons displaced from the Chagos Archipelago was discussed.

- 2. The scheme has been fully appraised in London and I have been authorised to inform you that the British Government are prepared to pay £650,000 (the cost of the scheme) to the Mauritius Government, provided that the Mauritius Government accept such payment in full and final discharge of my Government's undertaking, given at Lancaster House, London, on 23 September, 1965, to meet the cost of resettlement of persons displaced from the Chagos Archipelago since 8 November, 1965, including those at present still in the Chagos Archipelago.
- 3. Accordingly, I should be most grateful if you would confirm that you are willing to accept the payment of £650,000 in full and final discharge of my Government's undertaking, and to agree that the British Government may state this in public, should the need arise.
- 4. When replying, perhaps you would indicate the date and manner in which the Mauritius Government wish payment to be made.

d. French Somaliland.

France transmitted information on this territory from 1946 until 1957, the year in which this information was discontinued because, according to France, French Somaliland by referendum became a Self-Governing Territory. In 1966 the Committee of 24 considered the question of French Somaliland, 2 and on the basis of its report3 the General Assembly re-affirmed the inalienable right of the people of French Somaliland to self-determination and independence in accordance with resolution 1514(XV).

While Algeria and Oman had never been in the category of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Cook Islands and French Somaliland at one time or another had belonged to this class of territories. These two last cases show how the General Assembly, on the basis of resolution 1514(XV), has extended its competence to decide whether or not a Non-Self-Governing Territory has exercised self-determination even after the General Assembly itself has admitted that the territory in question is fully self-governing, though not independent, oso that Chapter XI did not apply any longer.6

General Assembly on the Dutch territories could be considered to be a precedent for the Cook Islands case, though in resolution 945(X) the General Assembly did not go as far as to affirm its responsibility towards the people of the territories concerned should they wish to change their status in the future.

See United the discussion was adjourned sine die. See Unite Nations Law Reports vol. I (1966-67) p. 49(9), and

This development with respect to Non-Self-Governing Territories is in accordance with the claim of the General Assembly to be competent to decide whether or not any territory has exercised self-determination whatever its constitutional status as regards another state —as in the case of Algeria— or whatever the special relationship placing the territory concerned in a position of dependence vis-à-vis another state—as in the case of Oman.

* * *

Thus the General Assembly has gradually built up its competence to decide on the question of whether or not a territory has exercised self-determination or whether or not a territory should exercise it. During the early years of the U.N. the General Assembly developed this competence on the basis of Chapter XI of the Charter. In more recent years, especially since 1960 when the existence of a right to self-determination gained wide acceptance, it has affirmed its competence to declare that a colonial situation exists with respect to selfdetermination without referring to the provisions of Chapter XI. This assumption of competence has invariably been challenged by the states concerned as an invasion of their domestic jurisdiction or the domestic jurisdiction of -according to them- the Self-Governing Territory or state the status of which is being questioned. States have claimed that the constitutional

U.N.Y.B.(1967) pp.622-23. There was another attempt to re-open this question in 1971 but the item failed to be included in the agenda of the General Assembly (A/8441 and add.1). The same fate occurred in 1967 to a proposal to include the Comoro Archipelago*in the list of territories to which resolution 1514(XV) applied.

relationship between the metropolis and its territories is something that only the metropolis has competence to modify. However, it is doubtful whether states can claim domestic jurisdiction, since these constitutional changes purport to affect the international status of territories with respect of which they have pledged themselves to fulfil certain obligations. Besides, the General Assembly as well as the Security Council can decide on the status of a particular territory for the purposes of the Charter; this is true in the case of admission of states to U.N. membership and the Security Council also has to determine what is the status of a state as regards Article 32. Hence, there is no reason why the General Assembly cannot decide what is the status of a territory with respect to Chapter XI or Article 1(2). Therefore, though it is true that a state has the competence to define its constitutional relationship with territories under its sovereignty, any implications which follow from this relationship for the international status of the territory affected will depend, so far as the Charter of the U.N. is concerned, not on the decision of the member state but of the General Assembly. 8

Schachter argues that "when the practice of states in the United Nations has served by general agreement to rest in the organs the competence to deal definitively with certain questions, then the decisions of the organs in regard to those questions acquire an authoritative juridical status even though these decisions had not been taken by unanimous decision or "general approval". In this way evolutionary growth in regard to fields of competence has an important positive effect on the law-making potentialities of the organs." Schachter considers the right of the General Assembly to determine which territories fall within the scope of Article 73 as an example of this evolutionary growth of

C. The competence of the General Assembly on "non-self-determined" territories and claims of third states.

So far we have considered the competence of the General Assembly to decide the status of a territory as regards the exercise of self-determination vis-à-vis the competence of the state having jurisdiction or controlling, in one way or another, this territory. But the question of competence does not end there since the assumption by the General Assembly of the role described above has unveiled new conflicts of competence, especially with respect to those third states which entertain certain claims in relation to the territory considered by the General Assembly as appropriate for self-determination. These questions of competence can be placed under the three following headings: a) competence to decide on the claim that a plebiscite should be held in a "nonself-determined" territory; b) competence to determine when the Charter prevails over the obligations undertaken in other agreements, and, finally,c) competence to deal with territorial claims.

- a. Competence to decide on the claim that a plebiscite should be held in a "non-self-determined" territory.
- i. The case of Cyprus.

In 1954 Greece asked the General Assembly to include on the agenda of its ninth session the following item: "Application, under the auspices of the United Nations, of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples in the case of the population of the island competence. "Law, Politics and Action in the United Nations" 109 Rec. des Cours (1963) vol.II pp.187-88. See also Castañeda, op.cit. pp.126-127.

of Cyprus". The letter of the Greek Government to the Secretary-General specified that this request was based on Articles 10, 14 and 1(2) of the Charter, and that the Greek Government reserved its right "to refer to Article 35(1) if it considered such a course to be justified by subsequent developments."

The real question was whether Greece could ask for a plebiscite to be held in Cyprus under U.N. auspices without interfering in the internal affairs of the United Kingdom. Greece considered that, although the island of Cyprus was a Non-Self-Governing Territory under British administration, "the freedom of the people of Cyprus was not a matter falling within the domestic jurisdiction of the United Kingdom". 10 A statement along the same lines can be found in the opinion on Cyprus given by Judge Alejandro Alvarez at the request of the Government of Greece: it says that

"Greece has an incontestable right to request that a plebiscite should be held in Cyprus to determine whether that island should belong to Greece or to Turkey."11

The United Kingdom contended that "a discussion of British administration in Cyprus, based upon the avowed objective of transferring sovereignty over that island to another Member of the United Nations was a violation of Article 2(7)," since sovereignty over territory acknowledged internationally by treaty is a matter falling within the domestic jurisdiction of the state concerned. 14

^{14.} G.A.O.R. 9th sess. plen. mtg.477th para.119.

The question of competence in this case is remarkably similar to the one described in the case of the Aaland Islands. We have seen how on that occasion a Commission of Jurists found that the decision to organise a plebiscite was within the domestic jurisdiction of the territorial sovereign, except in those cases in which the sovereign was not clearly formed. The representative of Turkey expressed his Government's point of view in a way that recalls the arguments used by the Commission of Jurists in the Aaland Islands question. He stated that

"The Charter, as well as the accepted practice of International Law, had an entirely different set of rules concerning sovereign countries and Non-Self-Governing Territories which constituted a national entity on the one hand, and concerning certain Non-Self-Governing Territories which lacked the characteristics of a nation or of a juridical state organisation on the other."17

Then he proceeded to apply this distinction to Article 73(b) of the Charter and to the case of Cyprus and maintained that Cyprus fell within the second category: it did not constitute a nation because of the two communities living there; it did not constitute a state because it was a Non-Self-Governing Territory. 18 However, contrary to the Commission of Jurists' conclusion, the Turkish representative did not accept that in the case of Cyprus the Greek claim should be upheld, because, he contended, the General Assembly should take into account "the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples", ¹⁹ and a plebiscite such as was proposed by Greece would be a denial of self-determination for the Turkish Cypriots. Turkey would accept the Greek claim if a separate right of self-determination was recognised to the Turkish minority. ²⁰

Therefore, it can be concluded that both the Turkish position and the Greek position supported the General Assembly's competence to decide on a claim that a plebiscite should be held in a Non-Self-Governing Territory, though, of course, the two countries disagreed radically on the merits of the case. Unfortunately, no mention of this issue was made by the General Assembly in the resolutions which it adopted on Cyprus.

ii. The case of West Irian.

In 1961 the Netherlands proposed to the General Assembly a draft resolution 21 on West Irian 22 providing for the establishment of a U.N. Commission for Netherlands New Guinea with, inter alia, the functions of inquiring into the possibility of organising a plebiscite under the supervision of the U.N. to ascertain the wishes of the population about its future and consider the timing of the plebiscite necessary to this end. This draft resolution was not pressed to a vote when another draft with a specific reference to the wishes of the population of West Irian was proposed by a group of states. 23 This second draft resolution failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority for its adoption. 24

iii. The case of French Somaliland.

In 1965 the Republic of Somalia brought to the attention of the Committe of 24 the colonial situation in French Somaliland. 25 The Committee did not consider this question until 1966, and, by then, France had promised the inhabitants a plebiscite in the territory not later than July 1967. Somalia expressed its misgivings on the way that such a consultation would be carried out and asked the U.N. to supervise it. The General Assembly adopted a resolution requesting the Administering Power to make, in consultation with the Secretary General, "appropriate arrangements for a United Nations presence before, and supervision during, the holding of a referendum."26 France did not comply 24. The vote, by roll-call, was 53 to 41, with 9 abstentions. A separate vote had been taken on the last preambular paragraph of this draft resolution; by this paragraph the General Assembly expressed its conviction that "any solution which affects the final destiny of a Non-Self-Governing Territory must be based on the principle of calf-determination of papelos in secondarios." Non-Self-Governing Territory must be based on the principle of self-determination of peoples in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations". Here the vote was 53 to 36 with 14 abstentions; the paragraph was deleted from the draft resolution since it did not get two-thirds of the votes. It must be noted that on both occasions the affirmative votes were superior to the ones obtained by another draft in which no reference to the wishes of the people was contained. (A/L.367 and Add.1-4; A/L.367/Rev.1). The vote in this case was 41 to 40 with 21 abstentions.

25. A/AC.109/121. The Republic of Somalia did not actually claim French Somaliland; it only asked that France give independence to this territory so that, then, it could decide whether or not it wanted to join the Somali Republic. as did British Somaliland a few

The Somali plan included a proposal whereby "The United Nations should, immediately upon the grant of independence to the Territory, assume the administration of the Territo-with this request, and at the next session the General Assembly, taking into account the circumstances in which the referendum took place, regretted the lack of co-operation of France and maintained that French Somaliland had not yet fully exercised its right to selfdetermination. 27

iv. The case of Gibraltar.

The United Kingdom decided in 1967 to hold a referendum in Gibraltar on September 10th of that year. This move was prompted by the fact that it had not been possible to resume talks with Spain on the future of Gibraltar in spite of the General Assembly's resolution 2231(XXI) asking both countries to negotiate. On September 1st, 1967 the Committee of 24 adopted a resolution declaring that the holding of a referendum in Gibraltar would contradict the provisions of the said resolution 2231 in which a negotiated solution, taking into account the interests of the inhabitants of this territory, was recommended. The plebiscite took place as announced, and in December of the same year the General Assembly confirmed the resolution adopted by the Committee of 24 before the plebiscite took place and declared that the United Kingdom had contravened the resolution of its last session which had recommended further negotiations.

v. The case of the Spanish Sahara.

to be an integral part of their respective national territories. Spain, on the other hand, has adopted the position that the status of this territory should be determined by its people. The General Assembly, by resolutions 2229(XXI), 2354-II(XXII), 2428(XXIII), 2591(XXIV) and 2711(XXV), has invited the Administering Power, Spain,

"to determine at the earliest possible date, in conformity with the aspirations of the indigenous people of Spanish Sahara and in consultation with the Governments of Mauritania and Morocco and any other interested party, the procedures for the holding of a referendum under United Nations auspices with a view to enabling the indigenous population of the Territory to exercise freely its right to self-determination."

So far, this referendum has not taken place.

Thus the General Assembly has been faced with claims that a plebiscite be held in a non-self-determined territory advanced either by the Administering Power or by a third state. The General Assembly was reluctant to intervene in cases such as Cyprus and West Irian and no decision was taken on the question of plebiscites being held in these territories. After 1965 a change in the General Assembly's policy has occurred and it has openly endorsed or disapproved of plebiscites conducted by the administering states themselves, or it has fixed the conditions under which a plebiscite will be considered appropriate for the purposes of the exercise of the right of self-determination by the people of the territory concerned. Unfortunately, there is no recent practice on claims of third states of the Cyprus type, 29

^{29.} The claim of Somalia that a plebiscite be held in French Somaliland under U.N. auspices resembles the Greek claim on Cyprus. But in this case by the time the

however, it seems possible to conclude that the General Assembly, because of its competence to decide when a territory has exercised self-determination, could take the initiative and determine that a plebiscite should be held in a particular territory as a condition for recognising that it has exercised self-determination. Hence it could also uphold or dismiss a claim by a third state that a plebiscite should be held in a non-self-determined territory according to its own interpretation of what self-determination means for the territory in question. 30

- b. The competence of the General Assembly to decide on the applicability of Article 103 of the Charter.
- i. The Moroccan and Tunisian questions.

During the discussion of the questions of Tunisia and Morocco it was pointed out by France that the U.N. had not been given competence to revise treaties. 31 This issue was taken up by other delegates in the general context of the General Assembly's competence to deal with questions relating to these two territories, and it was argued that, since both territories were nonself-governing, the General Assembly could decide on the basis of Article 103 of the Charter whether the treaties by which Tunisia and Morocco became French protectorates were in conformity with the principle of self-determination recognised in the Charter. The Indian delegate put it in the following terms:

General Assembly took any action the colonial Power itself had taken the initiative of holding a plebiscite in this territory.

"...the fact remained that when an international treaty was interpreted or applied by a Member State in a manner inconsistent with the Charter, the United Nations was certainly entitled to call the attention of the Member State to that divergence, particularly when international relations and human rights were affected."32

A counter-argument was put forward by the United Kingdom and by Australia. The latter country's delegate stated that

In the present case there was no conflict of obligations within the meaning of Article 103; yet even assuming that there were, that fact would not confer competence upon the General Assembly, as Article 103, on a careful reading of the Charter and study of its context, had nothing to do with conferring competence."34

The General Assembly in the resolutions 35 adopted on the Tunisian and Moroccan questions expressed the hope that "the parties will continue negotiations on an urgent basis with a view to bringing about self-government...in the light of the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations". In the preamble to these resolutions the General Assembly referred to "the necessity of developing friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples", and considered that the U.N. "should strive towards removing any causes and factors of misunderstanding among Member States."

ii. The case of Cyprus.

A reference by Greece to Article 103, while maintaining that Cyprus should be able to choose, in full freedom, the administration it desired, ³⁶ was taken up by Colombia to imply that the U.N. was competent to decide that particular treaties had been superseded by the Charter. Colombia denied that such a contention could be construed on a reading of the relevant provisions of the Charter. ³⁷ The General Assembly recommended a negotiated solution in 1956 and 1959. ³⁸

It must be noted that in recent years, though Article 103 has not been mentioned in cases such as the Falkland Islands or Gibraltar, it seems that Argentina and Spain have relied on the proposition that, a right of selfdetermination having come into existence, the titles on which the United Kingdom bases its sovereignty over those territories should be revised along the lines of the Spanish and Argentinian interpretations of selfdetermination. The General Assembly has been more eager in these cases than on previous occasions to find that a dispute existed and to recommend negotiations to solve it. In the light of these initiatives it is suggested that the earlier reluctance of the General Assembly to take any steps which could be interpreted as favourable to a revision of certain treaties was due not to a belief of lack of competence to take such an initiative (indeed, Articles 10, 11(2) and 14 can very well cover this competence to determine when Article 103 applies) but to a lack of consolidation of the right of selfdetermination itself, and hence there was no firm basis on which to claim revision: after 1960 -i.e. General Assembly resolution 1514(XV)- it would be difficult to doubt the basis of self-determination.

c. Territorial claims.

i. West Irian.

When the Charter of Transfer of Sovereignty was signed by the Netherlands and Indonesia in 1949, the dispute over Netherlands New Guinea or West Irian was left to be settled in further negotiations. ³⁹ These took place on several occasions but failed to achieve any positive result. Indonesia then brought the question before the U.N. and maintained that negotiations with the Netherlands could only be concerned with the transfer of sovereignty over West Irian to Indonesia. The Netherlands on the other hand opposed this restricted view of the object of eventual negotiations. ⁴⁰

As regards competence the Netherlands stated that

"When legal questions concerning sovereignty were discussed, it was easy to loose sight of one aspect of paramount importance. That was that the First Committee was not a court of law dealing with a dispute about a piece of territory, but an organ which, if indeed it had a legitimate interest in the matter, should be primarily concerned with the welfare of the human beings concerned. It was with that in mind that the Netherlands Government's policy had been formulated."41

Indeed, the Netherlands delegate had stated that the Netherlands administration of West New Guinea was "a peaceful endeavour to create conditions for the self-determination of a population". 42 To this last statement Indonesia opposed the contention that West Irian had already exercised self-determination when the Republic of Indonesia proclaimed itself independent in 1945 and, furthermore, the General Assembly was competent to deal with this question because it concerned a Non-Self-Governing Territory. 43

The Netherlands opposed a draft resolution in which the General Assembly expressed the hope that the parties would pursue their endeavours with respect to the dispute which existed between them so as to find a solution in conformity with the principles of the Charter. 44 The reason given by the Netherlands to justify its position was that this paragraph, however harmless it might seem, meant that the General Assembly endorsed the Indonesian position and this was outside the General Assembly's competence. 45

Although an item on West Irian was on the agenda of the next three General Assembly's sessions, and also on the agenda of the sixteenth session, no initiative was taken by the General Assembly on this question.

ii. Gibraltar.

Before the Committee of 24 Spain claimed in 1964 that Gibraltar was an integral part of its territory and that the only way in which it could exercise self-determination was by being returned to Spain by the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom maintained that it had no doubts about its sovereignty over Gibraltar. The Committee of 24 adopted a consensus on October 16, 1964 whereby it noted that a dispute existed between the United Kingdom and Spain regarding the status of Gibraltar and it invited the two parties to find a negotiated solution to this dispute. The United Kingdom objected to such a consensus because, in the view of the United Kingdom, it exceeded the terms of reference of the Committee, since it was not competent to consider or discuss any dispute concerning sovereignty or territorial claims nor to make recommendations on a dispute. 46 The United Kingdom representative had already made it known to the Committee, before the consensus was adopted, that his government believed the Committee lacked competence to deal with the Spanish claims. Spain, on the other hand, contended that Gibraltar was a Non-Self-Governing Territory to which resolution 1514(XV) fully applied and, therefore, the Committee of 24 was competent to discuss any problem related to this territory, even if it meant discussing matters concerned with sovereignty. 47

A way out of the impasse created by the British and Spanish arguments was sought by the representative of Cambodia, who distinguished between two aspects of the question of Gibraltar: one concerned the status of the territory which, in so far as it was a Non-Self-Governing Territory, fell within the competence of the Committee of 24. The other aspect concerned the claim to this territory put forward by Spain. With respect to this second aspect he stated that "it is true that the Special Committee is perhaps not qualified to deal with the question of sovereignty, but this does not mean that this question should be kept outside the auspices of the Committee...since the territory of Gibraltar is at present non-self-governing, in order to make it possible to implement the right of self-determination and independence. There is no doubt that this question of sovereignty should be dealt with first of all...Therefore...[Cambodia] hopes to see talks held between the interested Powers and is ready to support any recommendation along these lines."48

In the following year objections to the General Assembly's competence to handle the problem of Gibraltar were voiced in the Fourth Committee by Australia. This country's delegate stated after voting in favour of a draft resolution 19 inviting the United Kingdom and Spain to negotiate on Gibraltar that his vote was "without prejudice to its position that questions of sovereignty over colonial territories were not the concern [of the Committee]". 50 In 1967 the United Kingdom said (when explaining its vote on a draft resolution on Gibraltar) 1 that it had voted against it because the wording used could be interpreted as an endorsement of the Spanish claim to Gibraltar, and this was not a question to be settled by the Fourth Committee but by the International Court of Justice. 52

The General Assembly recognised that a dispute existed on Gibraltar, endorsed the consensus of the Committee of 24 and asked the parties to negotiate. In 1967 it went as far as actually recommending terms of settlement, and in 1968 it fixed a deadline for the settlement of the dispute. ⁵³
